Part I.—Objects and Application of Law as to Merchant Shipping.

SECT. 1.—Application of Merchant Shipping Acts Generally.

Object of Merchant Shipping Acts.

1. The laws of England relating to shipping and navigation form part of the general common law of England. The common law has, however, been almost entirely superseded by statutes, the most important now in force being the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (a), and its successors.

(a) 57 & 58 Vict. c. 60. Subsequent Acts are the Merchant Shipping Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 59); Merchant Shipping (Exemption from Pilotage) Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 61); Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners) Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 14); Merchant Shipping (Mercantile Marine Fund) Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 44); Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 32); Merchant Shipping Act, 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 48); Merchant Shipping Act, 1907 (7 Edw. 7, c. 52); Merchant Shipping Act, 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 42), all of which Acts may be cited together as the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1894—1911; and the Merchant Shipping (Seamen's Allotment) Act, 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 8); Merchant Shipping (Stevedores and Trimmers) Act, 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 41); Maritime

SECT. 1. Application of Merchant Shipping Acts Generally.

The chief aim which the legislature has, by the passing of the Merchant Shipping Acts (b), set out to achieve may be said to be the establishment of a system of national identification in shipping. Upon the achievement of this aim must depend the achievement of all subsidiary aims, since the efficiency of legislation in respect of such matters as the safety of mariners, or the protection from discomfort or imposition of emigrants, must necessarily depend on the certainty with which the vessels upon which the legislature has conferred privileges or imposed liabilities can be identified.

The method by which the legislature has sought to achieve the identification of shipping is by the enactment of stringent regulations as to the registration of British ships, and as to the methods of proof of national character (c).

Use of colours.

2. A ship may be forfeited which improperly uses the British flag and assumes the British national character, unless the assumption has been made for the purpose of escaping capture by an enemy or by a foreign ship of war in the exercise of some belligerent right (d). A similar penalty attaches to the improper concealment of British nationality (e) and to the acquirement of an interest in a British ship by an unqualified person (f).

National colours.

The proper national colours for a British ship, other than one of His Majesty's ships or other specially exempted ships, are the red ensign usually used by merchant ships (g).

A ship belonging to a British subject must, under penalty (h), hoist proper national colours, on a signal being made to her by one of His Majesty's ships, on entering and leaving any foreign port, and, if of fifty tons gross tonnage or upwards, on entering or leaving any British port (i).

Conventions Act, 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57); and the Pilotage Act, 1913 (2 & 3 Geo. 5, c. 31), which by ibid.. s. 62, may be cited with the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1894—1907, as the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1894—1913. As to construing these latter Acts together, see note (f), p. 518, post. Throughout this title the abbreviation "M. S. Act" is employed for "Merchant Shipping Act," and to avoid constant repetition the regnal year and chapter are omitted.

(g) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 73 (1). The exemption is granted by warrant (ibid.). The Union Jack with a white border may also be shown without penalty (ibid., s. 73 (2)). This is a signal for pilots; see note (p), p. 606, post. For penalties attaching to improper use of a flag, see M. S. Act, 1894, s. 73 (3), and pp. 32, 33, post. As to what is meant by the "Union Jack," see title CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, Vol. VI., p. 362.

(i) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 74. These provisions do not apply to fishing boats (ibid., s. 74 (3)), and do not affect any other power of the Admiralty as regards colours (ibid., s. 75). SECT. 2. Application of Merchant Shipping Acts to Foreigners.

SECT. 2.—Application of Merchant Shipping Acts to Foreigners.

3. The provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts (k) are of so varied a character that general rules for their application to ships of foreign countries can only be formulated subject to all qualifications required by the particular case. Subject to such qualifications, the following classes of provisions may be said to apply to foreign ships (l):—

Foreign ships.

(1) Provisions applying in terms to such ships. Such are those relating to the carriage of deck cargo (m), to the inspection and regulation of emigrant ships (n), to the observance of the regulations for the prevention of collisions at sea (o), and to the detention of vessels not complying with the regulations as to loading (p).

(2) Provisions general in terms and applicable to foreign vessels: (a) where the foreign vessel is situated or the occurrence takes place within the jurisdiction (q), provided such application may be inferred (r) to have been intended by the legislature (s): such provisions are those directed against crimping (t); (b) where the foreign vessel is situated or the occurrence takes place outside the jurisdiction, provided such application may be inferred from the language used to have been intended by the legislature (a), or where such application is not in terms excluded and is demanded by public policy (b), or where the subject dealt with is remedy or procedure, and is, as such, part of the lex fori (c).

(q) The distinction between considerations applicable in accordance with whether the foreign vessel is or is not within the jurisdiction has been constantly insisted upon (The Zollverein (1856), Sw. 96, per Dr. LUSHINGTON ("The laws of Great Britain affect her own subjects everywhere—foreigners only when within her own jurisdiction")); see also Cope v. Doherty (1858), 4 K. & J. 367, C. A.; General Iron Screw Collier Co. v. Schurmanns (1860), 1 John. & H. 180; The Saxonia, The Eclipse (1862), Lush. 410, P. C.; The Wild Ranger (1862), Lush. 553. (b) As in the case of a vessel which may be compelled to take on board a compulsory pilot (The Annapolis, The Johanna Stoll (1861), Lush. 295). As to pilotage, see pp. 596 et seq., post.

(3) Provisions in fact applied to ships of a foreign country by agreement with the Government of that foreign country (d). Special provision has been made for the application to ships of foreign countries of the English statute law relating to the tonnage regulations (e), deserters (f), the prevention of unauthorised persons from going on board ships (g), the load-line (h), collision regulations (i), and life salvage (j).

SECT. 2. Application of Merchant Shipping Acts to Foreigners.

SECT. 3.—Application of Merchant Shipping Acts to Colonies.

4. The legislature of any British possession may by any Act or ordinance, confirmed by His Majesty in Council, repeal wholly or in part any of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts (k) relating to ships registered in that possession (except those contained in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, Part III., which relate to emigrant ships), but no such Act or ordinance can take effect until the approval of His Majesty has been proclaimed in the possession or until such time thereafter as may be fixed by the Act or ordinance for the purpose (l).

in regard to all the provisions of the M. S. Act, 1894, Part II., which deals with masters and seamen, by a special provision relating to conflict of laws. It is laid down by ibid., s. 265, that where in any matter relating to a ship there appears to be a conflict of laws, then, if there is any provision on the subject in this part of the Act which is expressly made to extend to that ship, the case shall be governed by that provision, but if there is no such provision then the case shall be governed by the law of the port at which the ship is registered. There appears to be some difficulty in reconciling the judgments in The Milford (1858), Sw. 362, and The Tagus, [1903] P. 44, with the terms of this provision; see, in this connexion. the judgment of CHANNELL, J., in R. v. Stewart, [1899] 1 Q. B. 964. Even although the court has jurisdiction to entertain both actions for wages and actions for disbursements against foreign ships, it may refuse to exercise the jurisdiction where the representative of the State to which the ship belongs objects on reasonable grounds to the court proceeding to adjudicate; see title ADMIRALTY, Vol. I., p. 70. The question whether the M. S. Act, 1894, s. 419, which imposes the duty of obedience to the collision regulations on foreign vessels which have not entered into any treaty in respect of ibid., Part V., applies in respect of collisions happening outside the jurisdiction has never been decided. The following cases, however, appear to be in point:—The Saxonia, The Eclipse (1862), Lush. 410, P. C.; The Koning Willem I., [1903] P. 114; The Astrakhan (1909), Shipping Gazette, 4th November. As to conflict of laws generally, see title CONFLICT OF LAWS, Vol. VI., pp. 177 et seq. As to the effect of foreign judgments in rem, see ibid., p. 295, and as to the effect of lis alibi pendens, see ibid., p. 298.

(d) Any of the provisions of the M. S. Acts may be so applied by Order in Council (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 734).

SECT. 4, Definitions.

SECT. 4.—Definitions.

"Vessel"; "ship."

5. So far as the statute law is concerned, a distinction is to be drawn between "vessel" and "ship." Both the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (m), and the Admiralty Court Act, 1861 (n), define the expression "ship" as including "every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars." The former Act also defines "vessel" as including "any ship or boat, or any other description of vessel used in navigation" (o). The statutory definitions do not purport to be exhaustive, and regard must in all cases be had to the context (p).

"Seaman."

So far as the Merchant Shipping Acts (a) are concerned, the term "seaman" includes every person employed in any capacity on board any ship (b), except masters, pilots, and apprentices duly indentured and registered (c). Although this definition is not exhaustive, it seems to include all persons covered by the expression "seaman" in the ordinary use of language (d).

(m) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 742.

(n) 24 & 25 Vict. c. 10, s. 2.

(o) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 742; see also Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63), s. 31.

B. 280 (fishing coble), and followed in The Mudlark, [1911] P. 116 (sea-going hopper); The C. S. Butler (1874), L. R. 4 A. & E. 238 (lighter). It seems that a dumb barge, while being solely propelled by oars, is never a ship (Everard v. Kendall (1870), L. R. 5 C. P. 428; Gapp v. Bond (1887), 19 Q. B. D. 200, C. A.; see also The Owen Wallis (1874), L. R. 4 A. & E. 175, and the cases cited in reference to Admiralty jurisdiction under title ADMIRALTY, Vol. I., pp. 71, 128). The question whether a barge incapable of propelling herself except by oars can be considered a ship while in tow of another vessel has not been decided. The term "ship" has been held not to include an electric launch exclusively used on a small artificial lake (Southport Corporation v. Morris, [1893] 1 Q. B. 359), nor a raft (Raft of Timber (1844), 2 Wm. Rob. 251); nor a gas-buoy moored as a beacon (Wells v. Gas Float Whitton No. 2 (Owners), [1897] A. C. 337), nor a "blow boat" or non-sea-going dredger (The "Blow Boat," [1912] P. 217); but a sprit-sail barge navigated only on tidal waters has been held to be a ship (Corbett v. Pearce, [1904] 2 K. B. 422). The expression "ship" does not cover a vessel which has for four years been used as a coal hulk (European and Australian Royal Mail Co. v. Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. (1866), 14 L. T. 704); as to a motor-boat, see Weekes v. Ross, [1913] 2 K. B. 229. Vessels fitted with sails which enabled them to run before the wind, but not to be navigated by means of their sails in the ordinary way, have, for the purpose of interpreting a Pilotage Act, been held to be ships (St. John Pilot Commissioners v. Cumberland Railway and Coal Co., [1910] A. C. 208, P. C.). So far as limitation of liability is concerned, an unfinished ship has been deemed to be a ship (The Andalusian (1878), 3 P. D. 182), as also a sea-going hopper barge without means of propulsion, but with a rudder (The Mudlark, supra); see note (a), p. 612, post. As to the mortgage of an unfinished ship, see Re Softley, Ex parte Hodgkin (1875), L. R. 20 Eq. 746. For a definition of "sea-going ship," see Salt Union v. Wood, [1893] 1 Q. B. 370. A landing stage is not a "vessel" so as to make it obligatory upon her owners to file a preliminary act in an action relating to a collision with it (The Craighall, [1910] P. 207, C. A.); and see pp. 374, 375, post.

Part II.—Ownership and Control of British Ships.

SECT. 1. Ownership.

6. Ownership in a British ship or share therein may be acquired in any of three ways—by transfer from a person entitled to transfer (e), by transmission, or by building. Acquisition by transfer and transmission have been the subject of statutory enactment (f). Acquisition by building is governed by the common law (g).

How acquired.

Ownership in a British ship or share therein is a question of fact, and does not depend upon registration of title (h). Whether registered or unregistered, the person in whom ownership in fact vests is regarded in law as the owner—if registered, as the legal owner; if unregistered, as the beneficial owner (i).

shipkeeper, steward and cook (Jane and Matilda (1823), 1 Hag. Adm. 187); a crew engaged for a voyage in respect of which the ship had never left port (Re Great Eastern Steamship Co., Williams' Claim (1885), 5 Asp. M. L. C. 511); a storekeeper who had not been actually engaged for a voyage (Thomson v. Hart (1890), 28 Sc. L. R. 28); a stevedore (R. v. City of London Court Judge and SS. Michigan (Owners) (1890), 25 Q. B. D. 339); see pp. 46 et seq., post. With regard to the regulations in respect of the accommodation of seamen: lascars (Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. v. R., [1901] 2 K. B. 686). For the purposes of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 86), persons whose natural calling was the sea, but were not at the time actually employed or engaged as seamen, were held not to be "seamen" (R. v. Lynch, [1898] 1 Q. B. 61, C. C. R.). For cases under the Employers' Liability and Workmen's Compensation Acts, see title MASTER AND SERVANT, Vol. XX., pp. 128 et seq., and as to the insurance of seamen under the National Insurance Act, 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 55), see title WORK AND LABOUR.

(e) A ship is not like an ordinary chattel which passes by delivery, and there is no market overt for ships (Hooper v. Gumm, McLellan v. Gumm (1867), 2 Ch. App. 282).

(f) For definition of "ship," see p. 14, ante. As to transfer and transmission of ships, see, generally, pp. 21 et seq., post. (i) Beneficial ownership in ships, which is now recognised by the M. S. Act, 1894, s. 57, was first recognised in English law by the M. S. Amendment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 3; see Union Bank of London v. Lenanton, supra, and M. S. Act, 1894, s. 57. As regards Scotland, see Watson v. Duncan (1879), 16 Sc. L. SECT. 1. Ownership.

Who may be owner.

7. Only persons and corporations qualified under statute may become and remain either legal or beneficial owners of a British ship or share therein, and no ship is deemed a British ship unless entirely owned by qualified persons (k). Persons and corporations so qualified are natural-born or naturalised British subjects; persons made denizens by letters of denization (l); corporate bodies established under and subject to the laws of some part of the British dominions, and having their principal place of business in those dominions (m), provided that persons naturalised or made denizens, or persons originally British born, who have become subjects of a foreign State are not qualified unless they take the oath of allegiance and also, during the period of ownership, are resident in the British dominions or are partners in a firm carrying on business in the British dominions (n).

SECT. 2.—Registration.

Obligation to register.

8. Every ship must, unless specially exempted, be registered (o), and no ship required to be registered which is left unregistered will be recognised as, or enjoy the privileges of, a British ship (p).

Ships not exceeding fifteen tons net register (a), employed solely in navigation on the rivers or coasts of the United Kingdom or of some British possession, within which the managing owners reside; ships not exceeding thirty tons net register, and not having a whole or fixed deck, engaged in fishing or trading coastwise on the coasts of Newfoundland or in the Gulf of St. Lawrence (b), and Government vessels (c) are exempted from registration. (k) Ibid., s. 1.

(l) As to letters of denization, see title ALIENS, Vol. I., pp. 312, 313.

required to be registered may be detained until the master produces a certificate of registration (d).

Effect of registration.

9. No notice of any trust, express, implied, or constructive, may be entered in the register book, and, subject to any rights and powers appearing by the register to be vested in any other person, the registered owner has absolute power to deal with a ship or share and to give effectual receipts in respect thereof (e). Subject to these provisions, persons claiming under or through a registered owner, provided they are qualified to be owners of British ships, may acquire and enforce a beneficial interest in respect of a ship as in respect of any other personal property (f).

SUB-SECT. 2.—Procedure and Requirements on Registration.

Survey.

10. Before registration every ship must be surveyed by a surveyor of ships (g), an official who is appointed and controlled by the Board of Trade (h). After survey the surveyor will grant a certificate specifying the tonnage (i) and build of the ship and any other particulars required at the time by the Board of Trade. This certificate must, before registration, be delivered to the registrar.

Marking.

11. Every British ship, unless specifically exempted (k), must be marked (l) permanently and conspicuously to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade with her name on each bow, and with her name and her port of registry (m) on her stern. Her official number and registered tonnage must be cut on her main beam. A scale of feet denoting her draught must be marked on each side of her stem and of her stern-post (n).

SECT. 2. Registration.

Application to register.

12. Application for registry must be made by the person or persons requiring to be registered as owners, or by their agents duly authorised in writing, or, in the case of a corporation, by its agent appointed under seal (o).

Formalities required.

A person (p) desiring to be registered as owner must before registration make a declaration of ownership, stating his qualifications to own a British ship, when and where the ship was built, the master's name, the number of shares held by each registered owner, and that, to the best of his knowledge and belief, no unqualified person is entitled to any legal or beneficial interest in the ship or to any share therein (q).

Builder's certificate.

In addition to the declaration of ownership there must be produced in evidence, on the first registration of a British-built ship, a builder's certificate showing her denomination and tonnage, the date of her building, the name of the person for whom she was built, and particulars of any sale which has taken place. In the case of a foreign-built ship the same evidence must, if possible, be given (r).

The register book.

13. On registration the registrar must enter in the register book, which he is bound to keep (s), particulars of the name of the ship and of the name of the port to which she belongs, the details comprised in the surveyor's certificate, her origin, and the names and descriptions of her owners (t).

Division into shares.

14. The property in a ship must be divided into sixty-four shares, and no more than sixty-four persons may be registered as owners of any one ship. This does not prevent persons being joint

s. 47. The name must not be so similar to that of another registered British ship as to be calculated to deceive (M. S. Act, 1906, s. 50; and Regulations made by the Board of Trade, issued 28th August, 1907, and having effect 1st January, 1908). For form of notice of change of name, see Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. XIV., p. 88. The name of a ship can only be changed with the written permission of the Board of Trade. Where such permission is obtained, notice of the alteration must be published in such manner as the Board of Trade may think fit, and the name must forthwith be altered in the register book and certificate of registry, and also on the bows and stern of the ship (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 4).

It would seem that in some circumstances the builder's certificate may be given for the purpose of obtaining registration before the ship is complete; see Goss v. Quinton (1842), 4 Scott (N. R.), 471; Woods v. Russell (1822), 5 B. & Ald. 942.

(t) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 11. The name and address of every managing owner for the time being must be registered at the custom-house of the ship's port of registry (ibid., s. 59). As to the registration of fishing boats, see title FISHERIES, Vol. XIV., pp. 628, 629.

owners of a share, nor does it affect the beneficial title of any number of persons or of any company represented by or claiming under or through any registered owner or joint owner. A joint owner may not dispose in severalty of any interest he possesses. A corporation may be registered as owner by its corporate name (a).

Closing the registry.

15. When a ship is actually or constructively lost, taken by the enemy, burnt, or broken up, or has by passing into the hands of unqualified persons, or otherwise, ceased to be a British ship, notice must at once be given to the registrar, who must enter the fact in the book, and the registry of the ship is considered closed, except so far as relates to any unsatisfied mortgages or certificates of mortgage entered therein (b).

SUB-SECT. 3.—Measurement of Ship and Tonnage.

Tonnage.

16. The registered tonnage of a ship is based on her cubic capacity. The various dimensions of the ship duly ascertained and multiplied together yield a figure from which, after certain deductions have been made (c), the registered tonnage of a ship may be calculated, one ton being considered the equivalent of every hundred cubic feet (d).

(a) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 5. As to the effect of transactions by a corporation under its corporate name, see title CORPORATIONS, Vol. VIII., p. 308.

(b) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 21; M. S. Act, 1906, s. 52.

(c) As to the deductions to be made in calculating the tonnage for the purposes of limitation of liability, see The Umbilo, [1891] P. 118; and p. 615, post; and as to limitation of liability generally, see pp. 612 et seq., post.

(d) The rules for the measurement of ships may be found in detail in the M. S. Act, 1894, ss. 77—81, Sched. II.; in the M. S. Act, 1906, s. 54; and in the provisions of the M. S. Act, 1907. They may be modified or altered from time to time by the Board of Trade (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 77 (7)), but not in such a way as to affect the deductions allowed in ascertaining registered tonnage (City of Dublin Steam Packet Co. v. Thompson (1866), L. R. 1 C. P. 355, Ex. Ch.). As to details, see Lord Advocate v. Clyde Steam Navigation Co. (1875), L. R. 2 Sc. & Div. 409 (what is a "spar deck"), and Leith, Hull and Hamburg Steam-Packet Co. v. Lord Advocate (1873), 11 Macph. (Ct. of Sess.) 597. The spaces, of which the cubic capacity may be deducted from the total cubic capacity of the ship, are the spaces occupied by the propelling power, such deduction not to exceed 55 per cent. after other deductions have been made (M. S. Act, 1907, s. 1); those framed in above the upper deck for the machinery, or for the admission of light and air (in certain cases only); those used exclusively for the accommodation of the master, or occupied by seamen and apprentices; those used exclusively for the working of the helm, capstan and anchor gear, or for keeping charts, signals, or other instruments of navigation and boatswain's stores; those occupied by the donkey boiler and engine, if connected with the main pumps; those adapted only for water ballast, other than a double bottom; and, in the case of a sailing ship, any space set apart and used exclusively for the storage of sails (M. S. Acts, 1894, ss. 78—81; 1906, s. 54 (1)). As to the measurement of ships with double bottoms, see M. S. Act, 1894, s. 81, and The Zanzibar, [1892] P. 233. As to the correction of errors in the registered tonnage, see M. S. Act, 1894, s. 82, and The Recepta (1889), 14 P. D. 131. Where the British system of measurement has been adopted by a foreign country the re-measurement of a vessel belonging to such country for any of the purposes of the M. S. Acts may be dispensed with by Order in Council, and the capacity of any spaces in respect of which deductions are allowed by British law may be taken to be as stated in the foreign certificate of registry (M. S. Acts, 1894, s. 84 (1); 1906, s. 55; see also The Cordilleras, [1904] P. 90). The countries in respect of which these provisions have been applied are:—Austria-Hungary (19th August, 1871);

SECT. 2. Registration.

SUB-SECT. 4.—Ports of Registry.

Port of registry.

17. Registration must be effected at a port of registry through a registrar of British ships, that is to say, at any port in the United Kingdom or Isle of Man approved by the Commissioners of Customs, through the chief officer of customs; at any port in a British dominion approved by the governor, through the chief officer of customs or the governor or his deputies (e); and at certain other ports through specified officials (f).

How changed.

18. A ship's port of registry may be changed on application to the registrar of the existing port of registry, made by declaration in writing of all persons appearing on the register to be interested therein as owners or mortgagees. The registrar of the existing port of registry will, on such application being made, communicate the particulars relating to the ship to the registrar of the intended port of registry, who will grant a fresh certificate of registry (g).

SUB-SECT. 5.—Certificate of Registry.

Certificate of registry.

19. On the completion of the registry the registrar grants a certificate of registry containing the particulars entered in the register book, with the name of the master (h). This certificate must be used only for the lawful navigation of the ship, must be delivered up on request to the person entitled to the custody of it (i), and Belgium (17th October, 1884); Denmark (29th February, 1868; 30th December, 1878; 20th April, 1883; 21st November, 1895); France (10th August, 1904); Germany (23rd July, 1889; 22nd February, 1896); Greece (14th August, 1879); Hayti (3rd May, 1882); Italy (11th May, 1906); Japan (27th January, 1885); Netherlands (3rd May, 1888); Norway (27th June, 1894); Russia and Finland (20th November, 1880); Sweden (18th August, 1882); United States of America (30th July, 1868; 19th March, 1883; 3rd October, 1895). Orders given under these provisions may be revoked by Order (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 84 (2)), as has been done in the case of Spain (29th January, 1904). For these Orders, see Stat. R. & O. Rev., Vol. VIII., Merchant Shipping, pp. 1 et seq.

(e) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 4 (1). The term "chief officer of customs" covers a number of officials; for definition, see ibid., s. 742. "Port" includes place (ibid.). As to the Commissioners of Customs and their powers and duties generally, see title REVENUE, Vol. XXIV., pp. 544 et seq., 592, 593.

(f) The ports or officials may be specified either by statute or by Order in Council. Ports in which officials have been specified by statute are Guernsey, Jersey, Malta, Gibraltar, Calcutta, Madras and Bombay (ibid., s. 4 (1)). Ports specified by Order in Council are so specified in virtue of the M. S. Act, 1894, s. 88, which deals with ports over which His Majesty has jurisdiction in accordance with the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 37); as to this jurisdiction generally, see title CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, Vol. VI., pp. 448 et seq. Orders have been made in the cases of Shanghai (15th July, 1904); Old Calabar (7th March, 1904); Larnaca (29th June, 1900). Officials specified by Order in Council are so specified in virtue of the M. S. Act, 1894, s. 4 (2), which deals with all British possessions other than the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man. Officials have been appointed for the following places:—Singapore, Penang and Malacca (9th July, 1869); Gibraltar (11th July, 1877); Tasmania (23rd November, 1893).

(g) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 53.

(h) Ibid., s. 14. As to the register book, see p. 18, ante. The certificate of registry is primâ facie evidence that the ship is British (R. v. Bjornsen (1865), 12 L. T. 473). As to the admissibility of the certificate of registry as evidence, see title EVIDENCE, Vol. XIII., p. 477.

(i) As to when refusal to deliver is reasonable, see Arkle v. Henzell (1858), 8 E. & B. 828; R. v. Walsh (1834), 1 Ad. & El. 481.

cannot be made subject to detention by reason of any title, lien, charge or interest (j).

Provisional certificate.

20. Provisional certificates may be granted by registrars and consular officers where the certificate of the ship has been mislaid, lost or destroyed (k). Such provisional certificates must, when the opportunity arises, be delivered up to the registrar of the ship's port of registry to be exchanged for a fresh permanent certificate (l). Provisional certificates, good for six months or until the arrival of the ship at a port where there is a registrar, may be granted by a British consular officer where a ship becomes British owned while situated outside British dominions (m).

Indorsements.

21. The certificate of registry must, where there is a change of master (n) or a change of ownership (o), have notification of the change indorsed upon it by the proper official.

Delivery up of certificate.

22. Where a registered ship is actually or constructively lost, taken by the enemy, burnt or broken up, or passes into the hands of unqualified persons, the certificate of registry must, unless lost or destroyed, be delivered up to a registrar (p). The certificate must also be produced to the registrar when an alteration is made in the ship, or when re-registration is necessary either by reason of the vessel changing ownership or because her port of registry is altered (q).

SECT. 3.—Transfer and Transmission of Property in Ships.

SUB-SECT. 1.—Mode of Transfer.

Transfer by bill of sale.

23. A registered ship or share therein, when disposed of to a person qualified to own a British ship, must be transferred by bill of sale (r). This document must be as nearly as possible in the

The court will only order the delivery of a certificate to persons with a clear title to it; see The Frances (1820), 2 Dods. 420. Provisions are contained in the M. S. Act, 1894, ss. 16—23, as to the furnishing of new certificates in lieu of one lost, or when there is a change of master or owner; and as to delivery up of certificates when the ship becomes the property of unqualified persons, see also M. prescribed form, and must be executed by the transferor and attested by at least one witness (s). Before being registered as owner the transferee must make a declaration of transfer stating his qualifications as to ownership and that, to the best of his knowledge and belief, no unqualified person is entitled as owner to any legal or beneficial interest in the ship or any share therein (t). The executed bill of sale and the declaration must then be produced to the registrar of the ship's port of registry, and the name of the transferee is entered on the register (u).

Transfer without bill of sale.

An unregistered ship (v), or a registered ship when disposed of to an unqualified person (a), may be transferred without a bill of sale or any special formality, but notice must be given at the ship's port of registry of a transfer to an unqualified person (b).

SUB-SECT. 2.—Transmission of Title.

Transmission on death etc.

24. Where property in a registered ship or share is transmitted to a qualified person on marriage, death, bankruptcy or otherwise by operation of law (c), such person must make a declaration of transit seems that all the gear necessary to the ship would pass, having regard to the adventure on which she is engaged at the time of her transfer (Coltman v. Chamberlain (1890), 25 Q. B. D. 328); but this does not include appurtenances (Re Salmon and Woods, Ex parte Gould (1885), 2 Morr. 137). Where "appurtenances" are expressly included in the sale, these do not include oil acquired by a whaler during a voyage (Langton v. Horton (1842), 5 Beav. 9); or gear not appropriated to the sole use of the ship (Re Salmon and Woods, Ex parte Gould, supra); see note (n), p. 24, post. As to fees, see Harrowing S.S. Co. v. Toohey, [1900] 2 Q. B. 28.

(s) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 24 (2). The form is that marked "A" in ibid., Sched. I., Part I., but is subject to alteration by the Commissioners of Customs with the consent of the Board of Trade (ibid., s. 65). For statutory form of a bill of sale, see Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. XIV., p. 53.

(u) Ibid., s. 26.

(v) This mode of transfer is not required in the case of an unregistered ship, even, apparently, where such ship ought to have been registered (Union Bank of London v. Lenanton (1878), 3 C. P. D. 243, C. A.; see p. 15, ante), nor in the case of a ship which has been registered, although not required to be so (Benyon v. Cresswell (1848), 12 Q. B. 899), nor in the case of a ship which, from long and continued use as a coal hulk, has ceased to rank as a ship (European and Australian Royal Mail Co. v. Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. (1866), 2 Mar. L. C. 351). A transfer or assignment of a ship or vessel, or any share thereof, need not be registered under the Bills of Sale Acts; see title BILLS OF SALE, Vol. III., p. 17. This mode of transfer is required in the case of ships sold by order of the court (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 29; see title ADMIRALTY, Vol. I., pp. 123, 124). An agreement to transfer a ship need not be registered (Batthyany v. Bouch (1881), 4 Asp. M. L. C. 380). For definitions of "ship" see p. 14, ante.

(a) The M. S. Acts (see note (a), p. 10, ante) make no provision for this case, but no interest, either legal or beneficial, can be acquired in a ship which continues to assume the British character, or if acquired may be forfeited (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 71). An unqualified person who is equitable owner of a share in a ship is subject to all liabilities of equitable owners despite liability to forfeiture (Von Freeden v. Hull, Blyth & Co. (1906), 10 Asp. M. L. C. 247). For form of agreement to sell a British ship to a foreigner, see Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. XIV., pp. 49, 50.

(c) The words in this provision are, "by any lawful means other than by a transfer under this Act" (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 27). As to the meaning and extent of this phrase, see Chasteauneuf v. Capeyron (1882), 7 App. Cas. 127, P. C.

mission, identifying the ship and containing the statements required in a declaration of transfer (d), or as near thereto as circumstances admit, and an account of the manner in which the property is transmitted, together with evidence to support such account. The registrar will then enter in his book the name of the person to whom the property is transmitted as that of the owner (e).

Transmission to unqualified person.

25. Where property in an unregistered ship or share is transmitted to an unqualified person on marriage, death, bankruptcy, or otherwise, the appropriate court having jurisdiction in the place of registry may, on application by or on behalf of the unqualified person, order a sale of the ship or share for his benefit (f).

Incapacitated persons.

26. Where by reason of infancy, lunacy, or any other cause, any person interested in a ship or share is incapable of making any declaration or complying with other statutory formalities in connexion with the registry of the ship or share, the guardian or committee, if any, of the incapacitated person may act for him, or if there is none, any person appointed on application made on behalf of the incapacitated person (g).

SUB-SECT. 3.—Prohibition of Transfer.

Power of court to prohibit transfer.

27. Any interested person may apply to the appropriate court having jurisdiction in the place of registry for an order prohibiting for a specified time any dealing with a ship or share, and such order may be made by such court on such conditions with regard to costs or otherwise as the justice of the case demands (h).

Mortgage.

28. A charge as security for repayment of money on a ship or a share therein may either be registered as a mortgage, in which case it is subject to various statutory provisions relating to statutory mortgages (i), or unregistered, in which case, although recognised as valid as against the grantor, it will only rank as an equitable charge upon the ship (k). No special formalities are required for the creation of an unregistered, or equitable, charge, and the court may treat as a mortgage that which is on the face of it an absolute transfer, if it should appear that such was the intention of the parties (l). Where, however, a mortgage is registered, the instrument creating it should be as nearly as possible in the specified form (m), and this, on production, is recorded by the registrar in the register book, the day and hour of registration being stated (n).

It is not necessary that the whole of the agreement between the parties should be contained in the instrument registered, and further stipulations may be contained in a separate instrument (o).

(ii.) Rights of Mortgagees.

Nature of mortgage.

29. The rights of mortgagees of ships are, so far as the special nature of the security permits, governed by the rules of law laid down in respect of the mortgages of other chattels (p). Inasmuch, however, as a ship differs in many respects from other forms of security (q), these rights have been the subject of special statutory enactments and numerous decisions which are now to be dealt with.

Position of mortgagor and mortgagee.

Except so far as may be necessary for making a mortgaged ship or share available as a security for the mortgage, the mortgagee is not deemed the owner of the ship or share, nor is the mortgagor deemed to have ceased to be the owner thereof (r). The result is

An equitable charge may be created by the deposit of a builder's certificate (Re Softley, Ex parte Hodgkin (1875), L. R. 20 Eq. 746), or by the deposit of a mortgage deed (Lacon v. Liffen (1862), 4 Giff. 75); and see title MORTGAGE, Vol. XXI., p. 134, note (p).

(m) See M. S. Act, 1894, s. 65, Sched. I., Part II. A mortgage executed in blank was ordered to be expunged from the register (Burgis v. Constantine, [1908] 2 K. B. 484, C. A.); a similar order may be made where a mortgage has been fraudulently registered by a person alleging himself to be a mortgagee (Brond v. Broomhall, [1906] 1 K. B. 571; see also Holderness v. Lamport (1861), 29 Beav. 129). A mistake in the name of the vessel will not invalidate a mortgage, provided there is no question as to identity (Bell v. Bank of London (1858), 3 H. & N. 730).

(n) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 31. Where a ship and her "appurtenances" are mortgaged it is usually understood that the mortgage extends to everything on board her necessary to the prosecution of the adventure on which she is engaged (Coltman v. Chamberlain (1890), 25 Q. B. D. 328); but in order to rank as "appurtenances" gear must be actually appropriated to the mortgaged ship (Re Salmon and Woods, Ex parte Gould (1885), 2 Morr. 137); and the mortgage of a whaler does not include oil acquired during the voyage (Langton v. Horton, supra); and see note (r), p. 21, ante. A policy of insurance upon a ship may be mortgaged as a separate security (Swan and Cleland's Graving Dock and Slipway Co. v. Maritime Insurance Co. and Croshaw, [1907] 1 K. B. 116); and see title MORTGAGE, Vol. XXI., p. 134.

that while as between the parties to the mortgage the property in the ship has passed (s), yet so far as regards third parties the mortgagor remains dominus with regard to everything connected with the employment of the ship (t), and the mortgagee is protected from liabilities connected therewith (u).

Possession.

30. The chief right of a mortgagee of a ship (a), or of a majority of shares in a ship, is the right in proper circumstances to take possession. This he may do even before any part of the mortgage debt has become due (b) if his security is being impaired (c) in some material way (d).

Possession may be either actual (e) or constructive. To obtain constructive possession the mortgagee must clearly indicate his intention to assume the rights of ownership (f).

Where the mortgagee is justified in taking possession, and in so doing has been compelled to pay off claims for wages or disbursements, or to incur other expenses to avoid the exercise of a maritime

(c) The Blanche, supra; The Manor, [1907] P. 339, C. A. The security may be impaired by the action of the mortgagor himself, as by the carriage of contraband (Law Guarantee and Trust Society v. Russian Bank for Foreign Trade, [1905] 1 K. B. 815, C. A.), or by so working the ship as to render her constantly liable to arrest (The Manor, supra), or by the action of other persons, such as creditors, who may desire to seize the ship (Dickinson v. Kitchen, supra; see also The Celtic King, [1894] P. 175; Jackson v. Vernon (1789), 1 Hy. Bl. 114; Baker v. Buckle (1822), 7 Moore (C. P.), 349; Briggs v. Wilkinson (1827), 7 B. & C. 30). In the following cases the security was held not to be impaired:—De Mattos v. Gibson (1859), 5 Jur. (N. S.) 347; Collins v. Lamport, supra; The Innisfallen (1866), L. R. 1 A. & E. 72; The Cathcart, supra; The Maxima (1878), 4 Asp. M. L. C. 21; Cory Brothers & Co. v. Stewart (1886), 2 T. L. R. 508, C. A.; The Blanche, supra.

(d) It is not enough merely to show that the enforcement of the security is about to be rendered difficult by the removal of the ship from the jurisdiction (The Fanchon (1880), 5 P. D. 173); nor will the mortgagee be entitled to bail in such a case (The Highlander (1843), 2 Wm. Rob. 109); nor is it enough to show that the ship is not profitably employed (Keith v. Burrows, supra). As to failure to insure, see Laming & Co. v. Seater (1889), 16 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 828; The Heather Bell, [1901] P. 272, C. A.; Law Guarantee and Trust Society v. Russian Bank for Foreign Trade, supra.

(e) Actual possession may be taken either by putting a man in possession without the assistance of the court, or by the arrest of the ship in a mortgagee's action; and see title ADMIRALTY, Vol. I., p. 65. A mortgagee of shares cannot bring a restraint action (The Innisfallen, supra). As to costs, see The Kestrel (1866), L. R. 1 A. & E. 78 (mortgagee allowed party and party costs). For form of authority to take possession of a ship on behalf of a mortgagee, see Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. XIV., p. 65.

SECT. 3. Transfer and Transmission of Property in Ships.

lien (g) by third parties, he can recover the amount expended from the mortgagor (h).

Position of mortgagee in possession.

31. The mortgagee on taking possession becomes entitled to enjoy any contractual rights relating to the employment of the ship which the mortgagor may have entered into (i). On the other hand the mortgagee, in addition to being liable for expenses incurred in the future working of the ship (k), is bound (l) to perform contractual duties incurred by the mortgagor of a kind usually incurred by a person who has the apparent ownership and control of a vessel (m), provided such engagements relate solely to the future (n) and are not of such a nature as to impair the security (o).

Freight.

Until the mortgagee takes possession the earnings of the ship, apart from special stipulation, remain the property of the mortgagor (p), but directly the mortgagee takes possession he

(h) The mortgagee recovers on the principle that he has paid a debt for which another was liable by compulsion of law (Johnson v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Co. (1867), L. R. 3 C. P. 38; The Orchis (1890), 15 P. D. 38; The Heather Bell, [1901] P. 272, C. A.). As to this principle, generally, see title CONTRACT, Vol. VII., pp. 465 et seq. The principle appears to cover both the payment off of claims for wages and of those for disbursements (The Blazer (1911), Admiralty Court, 6th February (unreported)). It appears that the correct course for a mortgagee who has paid off liens or who desires to do so is to obtain leave from the court to stand in the shoes of the lien-holder as against the mortgagor (ibid.). To what extent the mortgagee can recover moneys so paid in rem in addition to the mortgage debt seems doubtful (The Cornelia Henrietta (1866), L. R. 1 A. & E. 51; The St. Lawrence (1880), 5 P. D. 250; The Tagus, [1903] P. 44). Mortgagees of shares in a ship will not be held liable to contribute to the paying off of liens by other part-owners, and will not be held impliedly to have authorised such payment merely from the fact that their property may have been thereby benefited (The Ripon City, [1898] P. 78).

(n) Neither the mortgagee, nor the ship when it has passed into his possession, is liable to the creditors of the mortgagor, unless such creditors are in a position to exercise a maritime lien (The Troubadour (1866), L. R. 1 A. & E. 302; The El Argentino, [1909] P. 236); as to maritime lien, see pp. 617 et seq., post. Although not personally liable, the mortgagee may always come in and defend the ship when sued, but only such defences are open to him as would have been open to the mortgagor (The Chieftain (1863), Brown. & Lush. 104; The "Julindur" (1853), 1 Ecc. & Ad. 71).

(o) Law Guarantee and Trust Society v. Russian Bank for Foreign Trade, [1905] 1 K. B. 815, C. A. It appears that the mortgagee will not be bound even though the contract was entered into before the mortgagee came into existence, provided he cannot be considered to have had notice or its equivalent (The Celtic King, [1894] P. 175; but see Law Guarantee and Trust Society v. Russian Bank for Foreign Trade, supra). If the mortgagee takes his mortgage with knowledge of a contract, he is bound (De Mattos v. Gibson (1859), 5 Jur. (N. S.) 347). As to impairment of the security, see the cases cited in note (c), p. 25, ante.

becomes entitled to all the freight (q) not already due and payable (r). When the freight has once come into the hands of the mortgagor, the mortgagee, unless by some right other than that afforded by the mere mortgage (s), cannot recover it from him (t).

Sale.

A registered mortgagee in possession has, in addition to complete control over the ship (a), a right to sell the ship or share in respect of which he is mortgagee, and to give effectual receipts for the purchase-money (b). He may recover the expenses of the sale from the mortgagor (c).

Bankruptcy of mortgagor.

The rights of a mortgagee are not affected by an act of bankruptcy committed by the mortgagor, either before (d) or after (e) the date of the mortgage, provided that in the former case the mortgagee has no notice of the act of bankruptcy.

(q) The freight to which the mortgagee is entitled is the gross freight without any deduction of sums which may be due to the charterer from the mortgagor (Tanner v. Phillips (1872), 42 L. J. (CH.) 125), or of any expenditure not authorised by him incurred in the earning of the freight (El Argentino, [1909] P. 236). As to the payment of freight generally, see pp. 291 et seq., post.

(r) If possession be taken before the voyage is concluded by the delivery of the cargo, the mortgagee is entitled to freight (Cato v. Irving (1852), 5 De G. & Sm. 210; Brown v. Tanner, supra). Whether the mortgagee is entitled to the freight where the mortgagor has landed the goods retaining a lien for freight is doubtful (The Edward Cardwell (1865), 2 Mar. L. C. 236). The mortgagee is not entitled to freight, even though unpaid at the time of taking possession, if he has not taken possession until the cargo is delivered and the freight earned (Shillito v. Biggart, [1903] 1 K. B. 683) A mortgagee of shares is entitled to his proper share of freight earned and received after taking possession (Alexander v. Simms (1854), 5 De G. M. & G. 57, C. A.; Essarts v. Whinney (1903), 9 Asp. M. L. C. 363, C. A.). In certain cases the court may appoint a receiver (Burn v. Herlofson and Siemensen, The Faust (1887), 6 Asp. M. L. C. 126, C. (b) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 35. The court may grant a sale to a mortgagee of shares (The Fairlie (1868), 37 L. J. (ADM.) 66). A mortgagee in possession is not bound to sell the ship, but may employ her in such a way as not to impair her value, and must not sell her disadvantageously (European and Australian Royal Mail Co. v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Co. (1858), 4 K. & J. 676; Havilland, Routh & Co. v. Thomson (1864), 3 Macph. (Ct. of Sess.) 313; Marriott v. Anchor Reversionary Co. (1861), 3 De G. F. & J. 177, C. A.). The mortgagee cannot be compelled by other persons interested to employ the ship instead of selling her (Samuel v. Jones (1862), 7 L. T. 760). As between the mortgagor and mortgagee, the latter may agree to terms limiting his powers of sale (Dickinson v. Kitchen (1858), 8 E. & B. 789; Brouard v. Dumaresque (1841), 3 Moo. P. C. Priorities.

32. The rights of unregistered mortgagees are postponed to those of registered mortgagees, even though the date of the unregistered mortgage be antecedent to that of the registered mortgage (f), and although the existence of the unregistered mortgage was known to the registered mortgagee when he took his mortgage (g). The rights of the unregistered mortgagee are also postponed to those of a bonâ fide purchaser for value without notice from the legal owner (h), and to those of all persons with prior equities (i). The unregistered mortgagee cannot arrest the ship (k).

Registered mortgagees rank, notwithstanding any express, or implied, or constructive notice, according to their date of registration (l). A second or subsequent mortgagee cannot sell the ship without the consent of the court or of every prior mortgagee (m).

A mortgagee of a ship or shares (n) has priority over the judgment creditors of the mortgagor (o), even though such creditors gages, but it is submitted that all mortgages are covered by the principle see The Ruby (1900), 9 Asp. M. L. C. 146.

(f) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 35. The unregistered mortgagee is only beneficial owner of the ship; as to his rights and liabilities as such, see p. 23, ante.

(g) Black v. Williams, [1895] 1 Ch. 408. Where a registered mortgagee has taken possession of ship and freight, he will be entitled to reimburse himself not only for his advances on ship, but also for any advances he may have made on freight without notice of other equitable charges (Liverpool Marine Credit Co. v. Wilson (1872), 7 Ch. App. 507; see title EQUITY, Vol. XIII., p. 86, note (f)).

(h) M. S. Act, 1894, ss. 35, 56, and see Barclay & Co., Ltd. v. Poole, [1907] 2 Ch. 284. It seems that it is immaterial that the purchaser had notice of the charge (M'Calmont v. Rankin (1850), 8 Hare, 1). A mortgagee who has agreed with his mortgagor to conceal the mortgage in order to facilitate the sale may find himself in like case (Hooper v. Gumm (1862), 2 John. & H. 602). Registered mortgages may be enforced even after the ships have passed into the possession of foreign owners (M. S. Act, 1906, s. 52).

(l) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 33. In certain circumstances the priorities as between registered mortgages may be deemed not to depend on the dates, and in such cases the statute does not apply. Thus, a first mortgagee, whose mortgage is taken to cover future advances, cannot claim over a second mortgagee the benefit of advances made after he has notice of the second mortgage (The Benwell Tower (1895), 8 Asp. M. L. C. 13). This rule does not apply where the agreement as to future advances is contained in a separate unregistered document (Parr v. Applebee (1855), 24 L. J. (CH.) 767, C. A.). Where a second mortgagee unreasonably disputes the claim of the first mortgagee, he will have to pay the costs of the dispute (The Western Ocean (1870), L. R. 3 A. & E. 38; but see The Volant (1864), Brown. & Lush. 321).

(m) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 35. The Act only refers to registered mortgagees, but presumably unregistered mortgagees are within the principle. When a first mortgagee takes possession of the ship and freight he may satisfy his own debt, and will then hold the balance for the benefit of subsequent mortgagees (The Benwell Tower, supra; Tanner v. Heard (1857), 23 Beav. 555), but there is not such an express trust in favour of the second mortgagee as will prevent the operation of the Statute of Limitations (Banner v. Berridge (1881), 18 Ch. D. 254; see title LIMITATION OF ACTIONS, Vol. XIX., p. 165).

The rights of mortgagees are deferred to those of persons having either possessory (s) or maritime (t) liens.

Assignee of freight.

33. An assignee of freight has no rights as against a first mortgagee who has taken possession of freight in virtue of his mortgage (a), unless the assigned freight became due and payable before possession was taken (b), but the assignee of freight has priority over a second mortgagee, even though he has taken the assignment with notice of the second mortgage (c). Assignees of freight are entitled to the whole freight mentioned in the bill of lading, without deduction of amounts due from the assignor to the consignees (d).

(s) Williams v. Allsup, supra ; The Scio, supra. Mortgagees, however, get their costs in priority to "material men" (The Sherbro (1883), 5 Asp. M. L. C. 88). As to possessory lien, see p. 621, post.

The principle applies even though the bond has been incurred in the course of a voyage taken in fraudulent breach of a contract existing between a mortgagor and mortgagee (The Mary Ann (1865), L. R. 1 A. & E. 13), or in the case of a master suing for wages or disbursements even when appointed by the mortgagor (The Mary Ann, supra ; The Feronia (1868), L. R. 2 A. & E. 65 ; The Ripon City, [1897] P. 226). The priority does not extend to any part of the mortgage debt personally guaranteed by the master (The Bangor Castle (1896), 8 Asp. M. L. C. 156). The master's right of priority does not extend to the recovery of the amount of a bond which he has been forced to enter into by reason of his own negligent navigation (The Limerick (1876), 1 P. D. 411, C. A.). As to bottomry bonds, see pp. 70 et seq., post. As to crew's wages, see Prince George (1837), 3 Hag. Adm. 376 ; pp. 46 et seq., post. SECT. 3.
Transfer and Transmission of Property in Ships.

(iii.) Discharge of Mortgage.

Discharge of mortgage.

34. Where a registered mortgage is discharged the registrar must, on the production of the mortgage deed with a receipt for the mortgage money duly indorsed thereon, make an entry in the register book to the effect that the mortgage has been discharged (e). The property in the vessel will then revest in the mortgagor, or other person who has become entitled thereto, regard being had to any circumstances which may disentitle the mortgagor to the property (f).

(iv.) Dealings with Mortgagee's Interest.

Transfer of mortgages.

35. A registered mortgage may be transferred to any person (g). The instrument effecting the transfer must be in the prescribed form, or as near thereto as circumstances permit (h), and the transfer will, on production, be entered in the register book by the registrar.

Where the interest of a mortgagee is transmitted on marriage, death, or bankruptcy, or similar occasion (i), the registrar will, on production of proper evidence, enter the transaction in the register book (k).

SUB-SECT. 5.—Certificates of Mortgage and Sale.

Transactions abroad.

36. Where a registered owner is desirous of disposing of a ship or share by way of mortgage or sale at a place out of the country in which the port of registry of the ship is situate, he does so by means of a certificate of mortgage or sale, which authorises some named person to create a charge or to make a sale in accordance with particulars of the intended transaction which are entered in the register book and also upon the certificate (l). Subject to various statutory rules, the certificate may then be used for the desired purpose, in conformity with the directions contained therein (m).

SUB-SECT. 6.—Equitable Interests.

Trusts and equitable rights.

37. Equitable interests in ships or shares of ships are recognised by modern English law (n). No notice of any trust may be entered in the register book (o), nor can the existence of a trust or

C.); but the court may in certain circumstances order the entry to be expunged (Brond v. Broomhall, [1906] 1 K. B. 571 (mortgage registered by a person fraudulently representing himself to be a mortgagee); Burgis v. Constantine, [1908] 2 K. B. 484, C. A. (mortgage never executed by the mortgagee)). Where a receipt has been indorsed by mistake the court will set aside the indorsement (The Rose (1873), L. R. 4 A. & E. 6), unless the priorities of other mortgagees are affected (Bell v. Blyth (1868), 4 Ch. App. 136).

SECT. 4.—Registration of Alterations and Renewal of Registration.

Alterations requiring to be registered.

38. All alterations must be registered which so affect the ship that she ceases to correspond with the particulars relating to her tonnage or description contained in the register book (a).

When registration may be renewed.

39. Registration may be renewed either when the renewal is ordered by the registrar on account of alterations (b), or, if application be made to the registrar, when there is a change of ownership (c), or when the ship has, since her original registration, ceased to be registered owing to having for some reason ceased to be a British ship (d). The registrar of the ship's port of registry may in any circumstances, with the permission of the Commissioners of Customs and Excise (e), grant a new certificate on the delivery up to him of the old one (f).

SECT. 5.—Returns by Registrars.

Returns.

40. Monthly returns must be made by every registrar to the Registrar-General of Shipping of all registries, transfers, transmissions, mortgages and other dealings with ships, of which he has official cognisance, and of any other particulars required by the Registrar-General. Semi-annual returns must be made by and to the same officials of all ships registered at the port at which the returning registrar officiates, and of all ships of which the registers have been transferred or cancelled at that port since the last preceding return (g).

On failure to register anew or to register the alteration the owner is liable to a fine of £100 and a penalty of £5 per day after conviction (M. S. Act, 1906, s. 53). indorsement on a certificate of registry purporting to be signed by the registrar or other proper officer, and certain declarations made in respect of a British ship (h) are, on production from the proper custody, admissible in evidence before any court, or before any persons having by law or consent of the parties authority to receive evidence, and, subject to all just exceptions, are evidence of the matters stated therein in compliance with the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, or by any officer in pursuance of his duties as such officer (i).

SECT. 7.—Offences and Penalties.

Penalties.

42. Penalties attach to offences in respect of the marking of the vessel (k), to false statements contained in builders' certificates (l), to refusal to deliver up certificates of registry (m), to the use or attempted use for the navigation of the ship of a certificate not legally granted (n), to offences connected with the naming of the ship (o), to failure to register the name of the managing owner at the custom-house (p), to failure to register a ship anew on alterations being made in her construction or to register the alterations (q), to the forgery or alteration of documents in connexion with the registration of the ship (r), to the making of false declarations in regard to title or ownership of or interest in a ship (s), to the concealment of British character by a master (t), to the hoisting of unauthorised national colours (a), and to the failure to hoist national colours in proper circumstances (b). the benefits, privileges, advantages, or protection usually enjoyed by British ships, nor to use the British flag or assume the British national character, but is liable to all fines and penalties applicable to British ships (c).

Forfeiture.

43. A ship, or share in a ship, is subject to forfeiture (d) where the master uses or attempts to use a certificate not legally granted (e), where no application is made for the sale of a ship which has been transmitted to a foreigner (f), where a false declaration of qualification has been made (g), where the British national character has been assumed or concealed (h), where an unqualified person has illegally acquired some interest in a ship (i), and where a ship has been engaged in piracy (k) or in an illegal form of trade (l).

Procedure on forfeiture.

Where a ship or share has become subject to forfeiture in respect of any of the above-mentioned offences, any commissioned officer on full pay in the army or navy, or a customs officer, or British consular officer, may seize and detain the ship, and bring her for adjudication before the High Court in England or Ireland, the Court of Session in Scotland, any Court of Admiralty or Vice-Admiralty in the British dominions, or any British court in a foreign country having admiralty jurisdiction (m), and the court will make such order as may seem just. The officer may be awarded a part of the proceeds of the ship, and will not be held liable either civilly or criminally in respect of the detention, but if the seizure was unreasonable the aggrieved party may be awarded costs (n).

Under these words it was held that the court had no option but to order forfeiture, even when the ship had passed into the hands of a bonâ fide purchaser for value without notice (The Annandale (1877), 2 P. D. 218, C. A.). The question as to whether the substitution of the words "subject to forfeiture" in the M. S. Act, 1894, conferred any option on the court was considered in The S.S. Maori King, [1909] A. C. 562, P. C., where it was held that in the Shanghai court no option was conferred; see also R. v. McCleverty, The Telegrafo or Restauracion (1871), L. R. 3 P. C. 673.

SECT. 8. Liability of Owners of Ships as Such.

SECT. 8.—Liability of Owners of Ships as Such.

SUB-SECT. 1.—Who are Liable as Owners (o).

Liability of owner.

44. Persons beneficially interested, otherwise than by way of mortgage, in a ship or share registered in the name of some other person as owner, are liable to all pecuniary penalties imposed by statute on the owners of ships, and proceedings may be taken separately against the registered or beneficial owner (p).

The register as evidence.

The register of a ship is, subject to all just exceptions, primâ facie evidence of ownership (q), and is also primâ facie evidence that a person registered as owner is the master of a person employed on the ship (r).

Liability for wages.

The owner of a ship is liable for seamen's wages, even though the seamen have in fact been engaged by a master, who is the charterer's servant (s). But where a ship is chartered by demise the owner is not liable in respect of an allotment note drawn by the master upon the charterer (t).

SUB-SECT. 2.—Liability while the Ship is Chartered.

Chartered ships.

45. The owner of a ship is not liable on bills of lading signed by a master who is not his servant, and who has no authority to pledge his credit, even though the shipper has no notice of the charter (a); but the owner is liable on bills of lading signed by a master who is in fact his servant, even though by the terms of the charter the master is to sign only as the charterer's servant. A mere reference to the charterparty in the bills of lading does not amount to notice that the master is not the owner's servant (b).

SUB-SECT. 3.—Liability as between Part Owners.

Part owners.

46. Persons owning shares in a ship are tenants in common (c). They may or may not be also partners (d), and whether they are or are not in fact partners, they may for certain purposes be treated as such (e). An agreement between part owners relating to the employment of the ship, as opposed to her ownership, renders them partners in all matters relating to the employment so agreed upon (f).

A part owner is not bound in respect of liabilities incurred by another part owner in regard to the ship, unless he has in fact (g) given authority to such other to contract liabilities on his behalf, or has held out such other as having such authority (h), or has ratified the specific acts of such other (i) which have given rise to liability (k).

Managing owner.

47. Part owners frequently delegate authority in respect of the managing of the ship to one of their number, who is known as the managing owner (l). The managing owner is agent for all the other owners (m), with power to do what is necessary to enable the ship to prosecute her voyages and to earn freight (n).

(e) E.g., in regard to Statutes of Limitations, such statutes do not run between co-owners while the co-ownership exists, the existence of co-ownership being in each case a question of fact (The Pongola (1895), 8 Asp. M. L. C. 89); see title LIMITATION OF ACTIONS, Vol. XIX., p. 171.

SECT. 8.
Liability of Owners of Ships as Such.

Distribution of profits.

48. Profits are distributed in accordance with any agreement between part owners, or in accordance with the interest of each partner in the ship (o). Before profits are distributed the sum earned by the ship must be applied to meet expenses (p), and no partner is entitled to a share of the profits unless he has contributed his proper share of the capital (q). A purchaser of a share in a ship which is at the time of the purchase engaged on a voyage, is entitled to a share of the freight earned on that voyage, but is liable for a share of the expenses of earning it (r).

Control of ship.

49. The right to the possession and control of the ship lies with the majority of the owners, or, as they are usually called, the majority owners. Where the majority owners desire to send the ship on a particular voyage, but she is in the possession of a dissenting minority, the majority owners can arrest the ship, and obtain from the court (s) a decree of possession, so that they may be enabled to employ the ship as they wish (t).

Similarly, the minority owners may, where they object to the voyage on which it is proposed the ship shall be sent, arrest her and sue for an order that she shall be restrained from pursuing such voyage (a).

For form of power of attorney given to manager of ship, see Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. I., p. 343.

(o) See various cases cited in note (n), p. 35, ante. A part owner may be entitled to sue for his share of profits, even though they accrue from an illegal voyage (Sharp v. Taylor (1849), 2 Ph. 801).

In either of these cases, before the majority owners are permitted to send the ship on the desired voyage they will be compelled to give security for the safe return of the vessel (b).

Where the minority owners object to the prosecution of a particular voyage, they are not obliged to contribute to the expenses of the voyage, but will not, on the other hand, be entitled to any of the profits (c).

Sale of ship.

50. In certain cases the court will order the sale of the ship, but a strong case must be made out even by majority owners, while the court will be extremely reluctant to make such an order at the instance of minority owners (d). In a proper case, however, the court will order a sale at the instance of minority owners (e).

which the ship is about to sail was negotiated by the whole of the owners (The Talca (1880), 5 P. D. 169; The England (1886), 12 P. D. 32). But the authority to charter the ship must have been withdrawn from the managing owner before the charterparty was entered into (The Vindobala (1889), 14 P. D. 50, C. A.). A foreign vessel may not be arrested at the suit of an English part owner, except possibly where the law of the foreign country is the same as that of England (The Keroula (1886), 11 P. D. 92). The court does not enter upon questions of ownership of a foreign ship where foreigners are alone concerned, unless by consent of the parties or upon the intervention of the representative of a foreign State (The Johan and Siegmund (1810), Edw. 242; The See Reuter (1811), 1 Dods. 22; The Evangelistria (1876), 2 P. The giving of a bail bond does not prevent the majority owners from subsequently disputing the right of the minority owners to have arrested the vessel (The Keroula, supra). The amount of the security given must bear the same relation to the value of the vessel as does the number of shares held by the minority owners to the whole number of shares in the ship (The Cawdor (1898), 8 Asp. M. L. C. 475; see also The Robert Dickinson (1884), 10 P. D. 15). The minority owners may not re-arrest until the ship has returned to the port to which her safe return is pledged (The Regalia (1884), 5 Asp. M. L. C. 338). The court has ordered accounts to be taken of transactions taking place before the Admiralty Court Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 10) (The Idas (1863), Brown. & Lush. 65); also between a part owner and one who had ceased to be a part owner by selling his share (The Lady of the Lake (1870), L. R. 3 A. & E. 29). The court has also ordered the earnings of the ship in the hands of third parties to be brought into court pending the settlement of a dispute (The Meggie (1866), L. R. 1 A. & E. 77).

Part III.—Master and Crew.

SECT. 1. Qualifications of Officers and Men.

SECT. 1.—Qualifications of Officers and Men.

Certificates of competency.

51. Every foreign-going British ship, and every British home-trade passenger ship (g), when going to sea from any place in the United Kingdom, every foreign steamship carrying passengers between places in the United Kingdom (h), and every trawler of twenty-five tons tonnage and upwards (i), must, under penalty (k), carry such certificated officers as are required by statute (l).

Granting of certificates.

52. Certificates of competency are granted to officers and engineers by the Board of Trade, providing they have passed an examination before examiners appointed by the Local Marine Board, and have given satisfactory evidence of their sobriety, experience, ability, and general good conduct on board ship (m). Officers who have served in the navy may obtain certificates of service without examination (n).

Where the legislature of any British possession provides for the examination of and granting of certificates of competency to officers and engineers, the Crown may, by Order in Council, recognise the validity of such certificates, and apply to them all or any of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts (o), or any other conditions or regulations (p).

(g) For definitions of "foreign-going ship" and "home-trade passenger ship," see M. S. Act, 1894, ss. 742, 744; for definition of "ship," see p. 14, ante.

(h) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 92 (1).

(i) Ibid., s. 413; M. S. Act, 1906, s. 81. Other fishing boats are not required to carry certificated officers (M. S. Act, 1894, ss. 260, 263). See, generally, title FISHERIES, Vol. XIV., pp. 628 et seq.

(k) Penalty, in the case of vessels other than trawlers, not exceeding £50, and the liability may fall either upon the employer or the employed (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 92 (2)); penalty, in the case of trawlers, not exceeding £20 (ibid., s. 413 (3)).

(l) The statutory provisions apply to all sea-going ships registered in the United Kingdom (ibid., s. 260), to all unregistered British ships which should have been registered (ibid., s. 266), and to all sea-going British ships registered out of the United Kingdom employed in trading or going between a port in the United Kindgom and a port not situated in the country in which the ship is registered (ibid., s. 261 (c)); but not to the ships of lighthouse authorities (ibid., ss. 260, 262), nor to fishing boats other than trawlers above a certain tonnage (see notes (i), (k), supra). A ship navigating merely in tidal waters is not a sea-going ship (Salt Union v. Wood, [1893] 1 Q. B. 370).

53. A duplicate of every certificate of competency granted, and a register of every such certificate issued, suspended, altered, or cancelled, is kept by the Board of Trade (q). Where a master, mate, or engineer, without fault on his part, has lost or has been deprived of a certificate, the Board of Trade will, on proper proof of the loss or deprivation, supply a new copy of the certificate (r). Preservation of certificates.

54. The master of every foreign-going ship, and of every home-trade passenger ship of more than eighty tons burden, must on certain specified occasions (s) produce to a superintendent the certificate of competency of himself, his mates, and his engineers. On such production a certificate is granted, which must be produced to the chief officer of customs before the ship is allowed to go to sea (s). Production of certificates.

SUB-SECT. 2.—Seamen.

55. No superintendent, before whom a seaman (t) is engaged to be entered on board a British ship at any port in the British Isles, or on the continent of Europe between the river Elbe and Brest inclusive, may permit him to sign an agreement if in his opinion he does not possess a sufficient knowledge of the English language to understand the necessary orders that may be given to him in the course of the performance of his duties. But this provision does not apply to British subjects, or to inhabitants of a British protectorate, or to lascars (a). Qualifications.

56. Two kinds of rating are contemplated by the law—the rating which the seaman obtains in accordance with statutory provisions by virtue of length of sea service, and the rating which he obtains, or, in other words, the capacity in which he serves, on a particular ship. Rating of seamen.

The rating which the seaman obtains by sea service, by virtue of statute, is that of able seaman. He is not entitled to this rating until he has served three years before the mast, service in decked fishing boats only counting up to a period of two years. Service must be proved by the production to the superintendent, or other officer before whom the seaman is engaged, of certificates of discharge (b), by a certificate of service from the Registrar-General of Shipping and Seamen, or by other satisfactory proof (c).

following places:—Canada, Malta, Victoria, New Zealand, New South Wales, South Australia, Tasmania, Bengal, Newfoundland (masters and mates), Bombay, Queensland, Hong Kong, Straits Settlements, Mauritius (masters and mates) (9th May, 1891). A further order has been made relating to Victoria (23rd November, 1893). An order has also been made relating to the whole of these places, amending the above-mentioned orders, dated the 22nd October, 1906.

(s) Ibid., s. 103. The occasions are, in the case of a foreign-going ship, (1) on the signing of an agreement with the crew before a superintendent; (2) in the case of a running agreement, before the second and every subsequent voyage. In the case of a home-trade ship, within twenty-one days after the 30th June and 31st December in every year (ibid.).

SECT. 1. Qualifications of Officers and Men.

The rating which a seaman holds on a particular vessel depends upon agreement at the commencement of the voyage, and such rating may be forfeited by reason of misconduct in the course of the voyage (d).

SECT. 2.—Contracts of Service by Master and Crew.

SUB-SECT. 1.—Engagement of Master.

Contract of service.

57. In every contract of service between an owner and master there is implied, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, an obligation on the owner and his agents to use all reasonable means to ensure the seaworthiness of the ship, both at the commencement of and during the voyage (e). Apart from this provision the master's contract of service is a matter of agreement (f).

Appointment.

58. In the ordinary course the master is appointed or removed by the owners of the ship, or by other persons having control over her, but in certain circumstances the master may be appointed or removed by the court (g), or by a naval court (h), or by other persons, who in cases of emergency are in a position to exercise authority (i). Where the master dies at sea his natural successor is the chief officer (k).

or representation made for the purpose of obtaining this rating is punishable on summary conviction by fine not exceeding £5 (M. S. Act, 1906, s. 58 (2)).

(e) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 458 (1). This provision does not apply where, owing to special circumstances, it cannot be complied with, or to ships trading from place to place in any river or inland water of which the whole or part is within British dominions (ibid., s. 458 (2)). As to seaworthiness, see pp. 77, 81, post.

(f) Reasonable notice must be given of discharge having regard to the terms of the contract (Creen v. Wright (1876), 1 C. P. D. 591). The law will presume that terms agreed upon with regard to a first voyage apply, in default of further stipulation, to a second voyage during which the services of the master are retained (The Gananoque (1862), Lush. 448). If wrongfully discharged a master is entitled to damages equal to his wages up to the end of the voyage, or until he obtains other employment (The Camilla (1858), Sw. 312 ; see The Royalist (1863), Brown. & Lush. 46). An action in rem for wrongful dismissal may be brought in either the High Court or the county court (The Great Eastern (1867), L. R. 1 A. & E. 384 ; The Blessing (1878), 3 P. D. 35)). SUB-SECT. 2.—Apprenticeship to Sea Service.

SECT. 2. Contracts of Service by Master and Crew.

Apprentices.

59. Apprentices may be bound to service either by private persons, to whom superintendents are bound to give facilities for the purpose (l), or by boards of guardians (m). Before proceeding to sea, the master must, under penalty, present the apprentice and his indenture to a superintendent, and particulars of the name of the apprentice, with the date of the indenture and of any assignment thereof, and the name of the port where such assignment has been registered, must be entered in the agreement with the crew (n). Every indenture must be executed in duplicate, and records must be kept of the execution, assignment or cancellation of the indenture, and of the death or desertion of the apprentice (o). Apprenticeship on fishing boats is the subject of special enactment (p). The court has power to rescind any contract of apprenticeship (q).

SUB-SECT. 3.—Engagement of Seamen.

Agreement for engagement of seamen.

60. The agreement with the crew, which must, under penalty, be entered into by the master of every ship, except a coaster of less than eighty tons registered tonnage, with every seaman whom he carries to sea from any port in the United Kingdom, must be in a form approved by the Board of Trade (r). The agreement must

(l) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 105. Forms of indenture, both for ordinary apprentices and for apprentices on fishing vessels, have been issued by the Board of Trade. Apprentices are not included in the expression "seaman," so far as the provisions of the M. S. Act, 1894, are concerned, but are so included in the provisions of the M. S. Act, 1906; see ibid., s. 49. An apprentice may sue for wages due, but not for the penalty under his indenture (Albert Crosby (1860), Lush. 44).

(m) Special provisions relating to the apprenticeship of pauper boys by boards of guardians are contained in the M. S. Act, 1894, ss. 106, 107. In order to come within the provisions the boy or his parent must be receiving relief in the union (ibid., s. 106). Every indenture made under these provisions must be executed by the boy and the person to whom he is to be bound, in the presence of and attested by two justices of the peace, who must ascertain that the boy has attained the age of twelve years, is of sufficient health and strength, and consents to be bound, and that the person to whom the boy is to be bound is a proper person for the purpose (ibid., s. 107). As to boards of guardians generally, see title POOR LAW, Vol. XXII., pp. 530 et seq.

(n) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 109. Penalty, not exceeding £5 (ibid.).

(o) Ibid., s. 108. The indenture is exempt from stamp duty. Any person failing to comply with these provisions is subject to a penalty not exceeding £10 (ibid.). For form of articles of apprenticeship to sea service, see Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. II., p. 49; and for official form, see ibid., p. 51.

(p) M. S. Act, 1894, ss. 392, 398; see title FISHERIES, Vol. XIV., p. 630. For articles of apprenticeship to sea-fishing service, see Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. II., p. 53; and for form of certificate under M. S. Acts, see ibid., p. 59.

Penalty, not exceeding £5 (ibid., s. 113 (2)), and attaches to carrying seamen to sea without an agreement in writing; an enforceable agreement may exist in the case of a ship which does not ultimately proceed to sea, although such agreement is verbal (Re Great Eastern Steamship Co., Williams' Claim (1885), 5 Asp. M. L. C. 511). As to proof of the contents of such agreement, see title EVIDENCE, Vol. XIII., p. 522. The same rules, with certain modifications, apply to the engagement of seamen at colonial and foreign ports (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 124). For form of agreement, see Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. XIV., p. 77. As to the engagement of the crew of a sea-fishing boat, see title FISHERIES, Vol. XIV., pp. 630 et seq.

contain particulars of the nature and duration of the voyage (s), of the number and description of the crew, of the time at which each seaman is to be on board or to begin work, of the amount of wages each seaman is to receive (t), of the scale of provisions to be provided (a), and of any regulations as to conduct, fines, short allowance, or other lawful punishment approved by the Board of Trade and agreed upon by the parties (b). The agreement may also contain stipulations as to the advance and allotment of wages (c). Apart from special provisions, the stipulations contained in the agreement may be as determined upon by the master and crew in each case, provided such stipulations are not contrary to law (d).

Signature.

61. The agreement must be dated at the time of the first signature thereof, and must be signed by the master before it is signed by the seaman (e). In the case of a foreign-going vessel (f) the seaman may only sign in the presence of a superintendent, who must have caused the agreement to be read over and explained to the crew. In the case of both foreign-going and home-trade ships a copy of the agreement must be posted up in some part of the ship which is accessible to the crew (g). Penalties attach to the fraudulent alteration of the agreement (h).

(s) The principle contained in this provision has been recognised from early times; see Minerva (1825), 1 Hag. Adm. 347; Eliza (1823), 1 Hag. Adm. 182; Countess of Harcourt (1824), 1 Hag. Adm. 248; George Home (1825), 1 Hag. Adm. 370; The Westmorland (1841), 1 Wm. Rob. 216. As to what is comprised in the term "voyage," see note (d), p. 60, post. In every contract there is an implied term that the ship is seaworthy; see pp. 61, 62, post.

(t) Where no rate of wages has been specified a seaman may recover on a quantum meruit (Porcupine (1825), 1 Hag. Adm. 378; Prince George (1837), 3 Hag. Adm. 376 (purser)), but where the wages are specified he cannot recover extras (Thompson v. Nelson (H. & W.), Ltd., [1913] 2 K. B. 523).

(d) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 114 (3). Stipulations providing for deductions to be made from seamen's wages for absence without leave which are different in amount and enforceable in a different way from the deductions allowed in respect of the offence by ibid., s. 221, have been held "contrary to law" (Mercantile Steamship Co. v. Hall, [1909] 2 K. B. 423).

(e) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 114 (1).

(f) These and other provisions relating to the engagement of substitutes and running agreements in regard to foreign-going ships may be found in ibid., s. 115. Agreements with seamen for service on home-trade ships may be made in respect of two or more ships belonging to the same owner, and the presence of the superintendent is not compulsory (ibid., s. 116). "Home-trade ship" includes every ship employed in trading or going within the following limits, that is to say the United Kingdom, the Channel Islands, and Isle of Man, and the continent of Europe between the river Elbe and Brest inclusive; "foreign-going ship" includes every ship employed in trading or going between some place or places in the United Kingdom and some place or places situate beyond the following limits, that is to say, the coasts of the United Kingdom, the Channel Islands, and Isle of Man, and the continent of Europe between the river Elbe and Brest inclusive (ibid., s. 742).

Certificates and delivery.

62. Where agreements with the crew have been formally entered into, certificates are granted by the superintendent, and these must be produced before the ship is permitted to leave port. In the case of a foreign-going ship, the agreement must, under penalty, be delivered to a superintendent within forty-eight hours of her arrival at her final port of destination in the United Kingdom, or upon the discharge of the crew, whichever happens first, and the superintendent will, on such delivery, give a certificate of delivery, which must be produced before the ship is allowed to clear inwards. In the case of a home-trade ship of more than eighty tons burden, the agreement must be produced and a certificate obtained every half-year (i).

Lascars.

63. The master or owner of any ship, or his agent, may enter into an agreement with a lascar, or any native of India, binding him to proceed as seaman or passenger to any port in the United Kingdom, and there to enter into a further agreement to serve in any ship bound to any port in British India, or to proceed to the Australian colonies, and there to enter into a further agreement to serve in any ship bound to the United Kingdom or any other British dominion (k). The ship in which it is proposed that the lascar shall return to India must be approved as suitable. A list and description of all lascars on board a ship must under penalty be shown to the officer of customs on the arrival of the ship at a port in the United Kingdom (l).

Rescission of contracts.

64. Where a proceeding is instituted in or before any court relating to a dispute between owner or master and seaman or apprentice, the court may, at its discretion, rescind any contract between owner or master and seaman or apprentice, or any contract of apprenticeship, upon such terms as seem just. This power is in addition to any other jurisdiction which the court has power to exercise (m).

Licences to engage or supply seamen.

65. Licences to engage or supply seamen are granted by the Board of Trade to suitable persons, and no person can engage in these occupations with regard to any ship, either British or foreign (n), unless a licence-holder, or a superintendent, or the owner (o), master, or mate, or servant in the constant employment misdemeanour (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 121), and an agreement, unless made as required by statute (see ibid., s. 122), is wholly inoperative (ibid.). See title CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE, Vol. IX., p. 753.

(i) M. S. Act, 1894, ss. 118, 119. Failure to comply with these provisions is punishable by a penalty not exceeding £5 (ibid.). In the case of an outward-bound foreign-going ship the master must, before sailing, notify the superintendent of any change in the crew made after the agreement has been made, or he will become liable to a penalty not exceeding £5 (ibid., s. 117). For definitions of "home-trade ship" and "foreign-going ship," see note (f), p. 42, ante.

(k) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 125. The form and conditions of the agreement are subject to the control of the Indian authorities, the Governor-General of India in Council, or the Governor in Council of any Indian Presidency in which the agreement is made. These provisions do not affect those contained in the Lascars Act, 1823 (4 Geo. 4, c. 80).

(m) Ibid., s. 168.

(n) R. v. Stewart, [1899] 1 Q. B. 964.

(o) A person may be owner for the purposes of this provision, although not the registered owner, if in fact he has control over the manning of the ship (Hughes v. Sutherland (1881), 7 Q. B. D. 160). As to ownership generally, see pp. 15, 16, ante.

of the ship; nor may a person employ for the purpose of supplying or engaging seamen anyone other than one of the persons above enumerated, nor receive on board any seaman or apprentice supplied by any person not entitled to supply seamen (p). A further offence is committed by any person receiving any remuneration, direct or indirect, other than the authorised fees for finding a seaman or apprentice for a ship (q).

Statutory scale of provisions.

66. The master of every ship for which an agreement with the crew is required must furnish provisions in accordance with a statutory scale, and is liable to a fine if he fails to do so (a). Where proper provisions are not provided in accordance with the statute, the seaman is entitled to monetary compensation on a fixed scale (b). The provisions and water of any ship going from a port in the United Kingdom are liable to inspection, and penalties may be exacted in the event of such inspection proving unsatisfactory (c). Certain of the stores carried by vessels going or trading from any port in the United Kingdom through the Suez Canal or round the Cape of Good Hope or Cape Horn must be inspected (d).

A certificated cook, who is able to prove one month's service at sea in some capacity, must under penalty be carried by every ship of 1,000 tons and upwards gross tonnage going to sea from the British Isles, or from the continent of Europe between the river Elbe and Brest inclusive (e).

(p) M. S. Act, 1894, ss. 110, 111. Penalty, not exceeding £20 for each offence and, if a licensed person, forfeiture of the licence (ibid., s. 111). Where proceedings are taken in respect of wrongfully supplying seamen, the burden of proving that he is a licence-holder is upon the defendant (R. v. Johnston (1886), 6 Asp. M. L. C. 14). For an instance of a conviction, see Nelson v. Richardson (1884), 48 J. P. 457, a case decided on the now repealed M. S. Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 147, re-enacted by the M. S. Act, 1894, s. 111.

(q) Penalty, not exceeding £5 (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 112).

(a) M. S. Act, 1906, s. 25. The scale is contained in ibid., Sched. I. The Schedule may be varied or added to by Order in Council (M. S. Act, 1906, s. 25 (4)). These provisions do not apply to lascars or others not accustomed to European dietary (ibid., s. 25 (5)).

(b) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 199. The seaman is entitled to compensation even though the shortage is caused by the prolongation of the voyage beyond its natural limits by reason of the severity of the weather (The Josephine (1856), Sw. 152). In addition to paying compensation, the master, if the court considers that the failure to furnish provisions was due to his fault, is liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding £100 (M. S. Act, 1906, s. 25 (3)). Proper weights and measures must be kept on the ship under a penalty not exceeding £10 (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 201).

(c) M. S. Act, 1906, s. 26. The master is liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding £100, or if the fault is that of persons other than the master, then such other persons are liable instead (ibid., s. 26 (2)). The master is also liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding £10 if he does not offer reasonable facilities for inspection (ibid., s. 26 (3)).

(d) The stores to be inspected are the beef and pork, preserved meat and vegetables, flour or biscuits, and water (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 206).

(e) M. S. Act, 1906, s. 27 (1). The certificate is issued by the Board of Trade (ibid., s. 27 (2)). The cook must be rated on the ship's articles (ibid., s. 27 (3)), and must be in addition to any cook required by the provisions relating to emigrant ships (ibid., s. 27 (4)). The penalty, which Doctors, medicines, anti-scorbutics.

67. Every ship navigating between the United Kingdom and other places is compelled, with certain exceptions, to carry stores of medicine in accordance with official scales, and also books of instruction, and foreign-going vessels having a hundred persons or upwards on board must carry a doctor. Vessels going to warm climates must carry anti-scorbutics, which must be served out to the crew, and the name of any member of the crew refusing to take them must be entered in the official log-book. A penalty attaches to failure to comply with these provisions (f). A medical inspector, appointed either by the Board of Trade or a local marine board, must inspect all medical stores and anti-scorbutics at least three days before the ship sails, and if these are deficient the ship must under penalty obtain a certificate that the default has been remedied before proceeding to sea. The inspector must also, at the request of the owner or master, examine any seaman to see if he is fit for duty (g).

Injury to or illness of seaman.

68. The master of, or a seaman belonging to, a ship who receives any hurt or injury in the service of the ship, or suffers from any illness, not being venereal or due to his own wilful act, default, or misbehaviour, is entitled to medicine, medical advice, and maintenance until he is cured, dies, or is returned to a proper return port at the expense of the owners; and in the event also of his death the owners must defray the expense of his funeral. No deduction may be made from the seaman's wages in regard to any of these expenses (h).

may be exacted either from master or owner, is a fine not exceeding £25, recoverable on summary conviction (M. S. Act, 1906, s. 27 (5)). As to summary procedure, see title MAGISTRATES, Vol. XIX., pp. 589 et seq.

(f) M. S. Act, 1894, ss. 200, 209. The exceptions referred to in the text are—(a) ships bound to Europe or to the Mediterranean Sea; (b) ships bound to the east coast of America north of latitude 35 degs., and to any islands or places in the Atlantic north of that limit exempted by the Board of Trade (ibid., s. 200). The penalties are—for failure to carry proper medicines, a fine not exceeding £20; for failure to serve out anti-scorbutics, a fine not exceeding £5; for selling or keeping bad medical stores, a fine not exceeding £20 (ibid.). If the offender is someone other than the master or owner the penalty is in each case a fine not exceeding £20 (ibid.). The penalty for failure to carry a doctor is a fine not exceeding £100 (ibid., s. 209; David v. Britannic Merthyr Coal Co., [1909] 2 K. B. 146). As to the right of a seaman to recover damages for injuries sustained by reason of failure to carry out these statutory duties notwithstanding the penalties, see Atkinson v. Newcastle Waterworks Co. (1877), 2 Ex. D. 441, C. A.; and compare Gibraltar Sanitary Commissioners v. Orfila (1890), 15 App. Cas. 400, P. C.; Butler (or Black) v. Fife Coal Co., [1912] A. (g) M. S. Act, 1894, ss. 202, 203. Penalty for proceeding to sea without a certificate not exceeding £20 (ibid., s. 202 (4)). As to who may appoint the medical inspectors, see ibid., ss. 204, 205.

(h) M. S. Act, 1906, s. 34; see also title BURIAL AND CREMATION, Vol. III., p. 407. The phrase "hurt or injury" includes illness contracted as a result of bad food on the voyage (Board of Trade (Secretary) v. Sundholm (1879), 4 Asp. M. L. C. 196). Under the M. S. Act, 1894, s. 207, it was held that the owner is not liable for medical expenses after the seaman has been brought back to a home port (Anderson v. Rayner, [1903] 1 K. B. 589, C. A.). In spite of this provision, where a seaman is discharged abroad with a venereal disease, the owners are responsible for his board and lodging and conveyance home, but not for his medical attendance (Board of Trade v. Anglo-American Oil Co., Ltd., [1911] 2 K. B. 225). For compensation for injury, see Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 58), s. 7, and title MASTER AND SERVANT, Vol. XX., SECT. 3. Care of Seamen during Currency of Agreement.

Where any expenses incurred in respect of the illness, hurt, or injury of a seaman have been paid by any authority on behalf of the Crown, and such expenses are by the Merchant Shipping Acts (i) to be paid by the master or owner, they may be recovered from the master or owner of the ship for the time being, and are a charge on the ship. The certificate of the authority is sufficient and, in the absence of evidence to the contrary (j), conclusive proof that the amounts have been paid (k).

Accommodation for seamen.

69. In every British ship of more than 300 tons burden, other than a fishing boat or a ship registered before the 1st January, 1907, an allowance of 170 cubic feet and 15 superficial feet must be allowed for each seaman (l) and apprentice in places, including mess-rooms, washing places, and sleeping places, occupied by them and appropriated to their use; 72 cubic feet and 12 superficial feet being allowed in the sleeping places. These places must be kept clear of all stores and goods not being the personal property of the crew in use during the voyage (m).

Complaints.

70. If a seaman or apprentice whilst on board ship states to the master that he wishes to make a complaint to a justice of the peace, consular officer, or officer commanding one of His Majesty's ships, the master must allow him to do so as soon as the service of the ship permits, if the ship be at a place where the complaint can be made, or if not, after the ship first arrives at such a place (n).

SECT. 4.—Wages.

SUB-SECT. 1.—When Whole Wages Payable.

Whole wages payable.

71. In the ordinary course a seaman is entitled to his whole wages from the time at which he commences work, or at the time specified in the agreement for the commencement of work or presence on board, whichever happens first (o), until the termination of the seaman's service, whether by the completion of the adventure or of the period of engagement, or by reason of the wreck (p) or loss of the ship, or of the seaman's unfitness to proceed on the voyage (q). The right to whole wages does not depend on the earning of freight (r).

The wages may be paid in foreign money at the rate of exchange current at the place of payment (s).

SUB-SECT. 2.—Time and Mode of Payment.

Damages for delay in payment of master.

72. In any proceeding by the master for the recovery of wages the court may, if the payment has been delayed by the default of the person liable, order that person to pay an additional sum by way of damages for the delay, without prejudice to any claim by the master on that account (t).

Payment of seaman's wages.

73. Every seaman serving in a British foreign-going ship must receive his wages in the presence of a superintendent (a). Seamen serving in home-trade ships may be paid in the same way, if the master or owner desire it (b).

A full and true account of the seaman's wages, drawn up in an approved form, must be delivered, either to the seaman himself or to the superintendent, twenty-four hours before the discharge or payment off (c), together with an account of all deductions (d).

Foreign-going ship.

In the case of a foreign-going ship (e), except where the seaman receives by agreement a share of the profits, the seaman must be paid £2, or a quarter of his wages, whichever is least, at the end of his engagement (f), and the balance within two clear days, unless he has consented to the wages being received by the superintendent on his behalf. Should the wages not be paid in accordance with these provisions, then, unless the delay be due to the act or default of the seaman, or to any reasonable dispute as to liability (g),

This is the case even when the superintendent declines to be present because he objects to a deduction from wages to which the seaman has consented (Keslake v. Board of Trade, [1903] 2 K. B. 453). If the wages are paid within the United Kingdom in any other manner, the master or owner is liable to a fine not exceeding £10 for each offence (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 131). "Wages" includes "emoluments" (ibid., s. 742). For definition of "foreign-going ship," see note (f), p. 42, ante; Thompson v. Nelson (H. & W.), Ltd., [1913] 2 K. B. 523.

(f) The end of his engagement means the time at which the actual service terminates, and includes the natural effluxion of the agreement (Re Great Eastern Steamship Co., Williams' Claim (1885), 5 Asp. (g) In the case of seamen who have left the ship abroad in circumstances which justified their so doing, it has usually been held that a "reasonable dispute" existed from the time the seaman landed in England (Lloyd v. Sheen (1905), 10 Asp. M. L. C. 75; Austin Friars Steam Shipping Co. v. Strack, Same v. Strack, [1905] 2 K. B. 315; but see Palace Shipping Co., Ltd. v. Caine, [1907] A. C. 386). or to any other cause not being the wrongful act or default of the owner or master, the seaman's wages continue to run and be payable until the final settlement thereof (h).

Home-trade ships.

In the case of a home-trade ship, a seaman must be paid his wages within two days after the termination of the agreement with the crew or the time when the seamen is discharged, whichever happens first. Should the master or owner fail to comply with this provision without reasonable cause (i), the seaman is entitled to recover as wages two days' pay for each day during which payment is delayed, to an amount not exceeding ten days' double pay (k).

Disputes.

The superintendent may, in the case of a foreign-going ship, on the application of either party, finally adjudicate as to any dispute, where the amount in question does not exceed £5, and with the consent in writing of the parties may adjudicate, whatever the nature of the question and whatever the amount in dispute (l).

Release.

When the settlement is completed the seaman gives a release, which is signed by the master or owner and is attested by the superintendent: this henceforward constitutes the sole evidence of the payment (m).

Seaman entering Royal Navy.

74. When a seaman leaves a merchant ship for the purpose of entering the Royal Navy the wages he has earned must be paid to the officer authorised to receive him, who will give a receipt. The amount so paid will not pass to the seaman until the time when, but for his enlistment, he would have received it (n).

75. When a seaman is left on shore abroad on the ground of unfitness, the master must pay wages due, if in a British possession, to the seaman himself, and if elsewhere to a British consular officer. In the latter case the amount will be subject to deductions (o).

When a seaman is left behind for reasons other than his unfitness out of the British islands, a statement of his effects and the wages due to him must be entered in the log-book, and the master must on his arrival at the end of the voyage furnish an account to the Board of Trade of wages due, and of expenses caused to the master or owner by the absence of the seaman in cases where the absence is due to desertion, neglect to join the ship, or absence without leave. The master is entitled to be reimbursed out of the seaman's wages and effects for such expenses (p).

(i) See The Turgot (1886), 11 P. D. 21; The Princess Helena (1861), Lush. 190. This provision does not apply to masters (The Arina (1887), 12 P. D. 118). For definition of "home-trade ship," see note (f), p. 42, ante.

(m) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 136. The seaman may except from the release any claim against the master or owner (M. S. Act, 1906, s. 60), and even if he does not do so the release will not necessarily be a bar to a claim for compensation arising out of an accident on the voyage (Buls v. Ship Teutonic (Owners) (1913), Times, 12th July).

SUB-SECT. 3.—Loss of Right to Wages.

Loss of right to wages.

76. A seaman may lose his right to wages already earned, either by failing to exert himself to the utmost to save ship, cargo, or stores in a case of wreck or loss of the ship (q), or by desertion (r). Where his services terminate before the date contemplated in the agreement, by reason of the wreck or loss of the ship, or his being left on shore on account of unfitness or inability, he is by statute entitled to receive wages up to the time of such termination, but not for any longer period (s). Apart from statute, the right of the crew to part wages depends on the terms of the contract of service (t), the seaman being entitled to wages till the contract in fact comes to an end (a) otherwise than in breach of such terms (b).

(p) M. S. Act, 1906, s. 28. Where a Chinaman deserted from a British ship at an Australian port and the master of the ship was fined £100 under the Immigration Restriction Acts, 1901—1905, of Australia, it was held that the fine could not be deducted from the seaman's wages and effects (Halliday v. Taffs, [1911] 1 K. B. 594). As to expenses due to desertion, see Deacon v. Quayle, Neate v. Wilson, [1912] 1 K. B. 445.

(r) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 221. As to desertion, see pp. 61, 62, post.

(s) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 158. A ship is a wreck if she is so seriously damaged that she ceases to be a navigable ship (The Olympic, [1913] P. 92, C. A., per BARGRAVE DEANE, J., at p. 101). A ship therefore which collided with another on her first day out, and was so injured that she was unable to continue her voyage, but was able to regain her port of departure under her own steam, was held to be a "wreck" within this provision (The Olympic, supra). A ship is not necessarily deemed a "wreck" because underwriters have abandoned her (Lloyd v. Sheen (1905), 10 Asp. M. L. C. 75 (discovery that cargo contraband)); and in any case abandonment must be clearly proved (The Warrior (1862), Lush. 476). Destruction of a neutral ship, not shown to have been carrying contraband of war, by a belligerent State constitutes "loss" (Sievwright v. Allen, [1906] 2 K. B. 81), but where, unknown to the crew, the vessel is carrying contraband of war, the right of the crew to wages does not cease with the capture of the ship (Austin Friars Steam Shipping Co. v. Strack, Same v. Strack, [1905] 2 K. B. 315). The scuttling of a ship in port to put out a fire has been held to constitute "wreck or loss" (The Woodhorn (1891), 92 L. T. Jo. 113). A seaman incapacitated by accident in the course of duty was formerly by maritime custom entitled to his wages for the whole voyage (Chandler v. Grieves (1792), 2 Hy. Bl. 606, n.).

(a) The contract was held to have come to an end so as not to entitle the seaman to further award in the cases of The Friends (1801), 4 Ch. Rob. 143 (capture); Beale v. Thompson (1803), 3 Bos. & P. 405 (detention); Melville v. De Wolf (1855), 4 E. & B. 844 (seaman sent home as witness).

(b) As in the case of desertion, for which the seaman is liable to forfeit all his wages and effects (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 221; see p. 61, post; and see Deacon v. Quayle, Neate v. Wilson, supra). Desertion may be proved by the production of the official log (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 231), as to which see pp. 82, 83, post. Where effects are forfeited for desertion they may be converted into money, and the balance of wages and the proceeds of the

SECT. 4. Wages.

Fines.

77. Any regulations as to fines which it is proposed to impose during a voyage must be stated in the agreement with the crew, after having been approved by the Board of Trade (c). Every fine imposed on a seaman for any act of misconduct is deducted from his wages upon the offence being satisfactorily proved (d). The amount of the fines must be paid over by the master or the owner to a superintendent or to the proper authority, and if he fails to do so without reasonable cause he is liable to a penalty (e).

Deductions.

78. A seaman or apprentice is not entitled to wages for any time during which he unlawfully refuses or neglects to work, when required, whether before or after the time fixed by the agreement for commencing work, nor, unless the court hearing the case otherwise directs, while lawfully imprisoned, nor while incapacitated by illness caused by his own wilful act or default (f). Deductions may be made in respect of the cost of procuring punishment in respect of an offence committed by a seaman in the course of the voyage (g), and of amounts properly paid under advance notes (h), or of expenses incurred by the owner in respect of the illnesses or burial of a seaman which he is not by statute bound to bear (i). The master must keep a record of the matters in respect of which deductions are made in a book to be kept for the purpose, and no deduction is allowed which is not included in the account of wages delivered at the end of the voyage, except in respect of a matter happening after the delivery (j).

SUB-SECT. 4.—Agreement for Extra Remuneration.

Extra wages.

79. As a general rule, seamen are not entitled to claim any additional wages in respect of services rendered in the course of the period of engagement, even though the master has agreed to pay effects after all proper deductions have been made goes to the Exchequer (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 232; and see The Parkdale, [1897] P. 53). Any question concerning the forfeiture of or deductions from the wages of a seaman or apprentice may be determined in a civil action, although it has not, even where it might have, been made the subject of criminal proceedings (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 233). As to forfeitures where the payment is by the voyage, or by the run, or by the share, see ibid., s. 234.

(e) M. S. Act, 1906, s. 44. The penalty is a fine, on summary conviction, not exceeding six times the amount of the fine not so paid (ibid.). As to summary procedure, see title MAGISTRATES, Vol. XIX., pp. 589 et seq. The proper authorities are, in the British dominions, the superintendent or chief officer of customs, and elsewhere the British consular officer or British merchant or merchants (ibid., s. 49 (1)).

them, the contract being considered void for absence of consideration as well as from public policy (k). The fact, however, that a vessel is about to sail short-handed is a fact that will justify an agreement to pay additional remuneration (l), and a seaman who is promoted during a voyage is entitled to be paid at an enhanced rate of payment (m), even though no alteration as to rate of pay is made in the ship's articles (n).

SUB-SECT. 5.—Payment in Case of Seaman's Death.

Payment on death.

80. When a seaman or apprentice dies on a British ship, either homeward (o) or outward (p) bound, the master must enter in the official log-book a statement of the amount of wages due and of any deductions (q). The balance of wages so ascertained is treated as part of the property of the seaman or apprentice (r).

SUB-SECT. 6.—Advance and Allotment of Wages.

Advance notes.

81. Whenever a formal agreement with the crew is required (s), the agreement may contain a stipulation for payment in advance to the seaman or his order of a sum not exceeding one month's wages (t).

Allotment notes.

A seaman may agree with the master at the beginning of a voyage for the payment of any part of his wages by means of an allotment note, either to a near relative or to a savings bank, and may insist that a stipulation shall be inserted in the agreement that any part of his wages up to one-half shall be so paid (a). The person in whose favour the allotment note is made out may recover the

An advance note is not negotiable, and the conditions upon which the note was given must be complied with before the transferee of such a note can recover (M'Kune v. Joynson (1858), 5 C. B. (N. These statutory provisions do not apply to a seaman engaged at a foreign port (Ritchie v. Larsen, [1899] 1 Q. B. 727; Rowlands v. Miller, [1899] 1 Q. B. 735). By the Piracy Act, 1721 (8 Geo. 1, c. 24), s. 7, no master or owner may advance to any seaman engaged in England, when abroad, more than one-half his wages due to him; see Ritchie v. Larsen, supra.

"Near relative" means wife, father, mother, grandfather, grandmother, child, grandchild, brother or sister (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 141 (4)). Allotment notes must be in a form approved by the Board of Trade (ibid., s. 141 (3)). As to agreements with seamen, see pp. 41 et seq., ante.

SECT. 4. Wages.

amount from any person who is in fact acting as owner (b). A wife may by misconduct forfeit her right to her allotment (c). The seaman will be presumed to be duly earning his wages unless proof is given to the contrary (d). Payment under an allotment note must begin after the expiration of not more than one month from the date of the agreement with the crew (e).

SUB-SECT. 7.—Remittance of Wages.

Seamen's money orders and savings banks.

82. Facilities are given, and regulations made by the Board of Trade, in respect of the remittance of wages to relatives and others by superintendents, by means of special seamen's money orders, and the establishment of seamen's saving banks (f). Where the balance of wages due to a seaman is more than £10, the master must, on the request of the seaman, give all reasonable facilities for remitting such excess to a savings bank or a near relative, in whose favour an allotment note may be made (g). The master need not give these facilities if the ship is in port and the money will become payable while the ship is in port, or otherwise than conditionally on the seaman going to sea in the ship (h).

SUB-SECT. 8.—Compensation for Premature Discharge.

Wrongful discharge.

83. A seaman who is wrongfully (i) discharged after signing an agreement (k) before the commencement of the voyage, or before one month's wages are earned, is entitled, in addition to any wages he may have earned, to compensation not exceeding one month's wages (l). Seamen wrongfully discharged have a right of action for damages (m).

SUB-SECT. 9.—Proceedings to Recover Wages.

Summary proceedings.

84. A seaman or apprentice, or any person duly authorised on his behalf, may, as soon as any wages due to him, not exceeding £50, become payable, sue for the same before a court of summary jurisdiction in or near the place at which his service has terminated,

Any superintendent or officer fraudulently granting or issuing a seaman's money order is guilty of felony, and is liable to penal servitude for a term not exceeding five and not less than three years (ibid., s. 147). Sentences not exceeding five years may be imposed in respect of various crimes in connexion with the issue of seamen's money orders and seamen's savings banks (ibid., s. 154; title CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE, Vol. IX., p. 753).

or at which he has been discharged, or at which any person on whom the claim is made is or resides (n).

A seaman engaged on a voyage which is to end in the United Kingdom may not sue for wages abroad unless discharged with the sanction required by statute (o), and with the written consent of the master, or on account of ill-usage (p).

Lien.

A seaman has a lien upon the ship for wages, and cannot by agreement forfeit the lien, nor abandon any other means of recovering his wages (q).

Master's rights.

85. A master, so far as the case permits (r), has the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of his wages as a seaman, and may recover disbursements properly made by him on account of the ship in the same way as he can recover wages (s).

Restrictions on actions.

86. Where the amount due does not exceed £50, the seaman (t) or apprentice may not institute proceedings in any superior court of record, nor in any court having admiralty jurisdiction, as an admiralty proceeding, except where the owner is adjudged bankrupt, or the ship is under arrest, or is sold by the authority of the court, or the claim is referred by a court of summary jurisdiction, or neither the master nor owner resides within twenty miles of the place where the seaman or apprentice is discharged, or put ashore (u).

The provisions of the M. S. Act, 1894, ss. 134 (c), 135 (2) (see p. 48, ante), relating to the additional wages due to seamen where there is an unreasonable delay in paying off do not apply to a master (The Arina (1887), 12 P. D. 118). The M. S. Act, 1894, applies to the masters of foreign ships (The Milford (1858), Sw. 362; The Jonathan Goodhue, supra; The Tagus, [1903] P. 44).

(t) "Seaman" in this provision may be read as "seaman or seamen," so as to entitle seamen whose claims in the aggregate exceed £50, but do not do so individually, to sue together (Phillips v. Highland Rail. Co., The Ferret, (1883), 3 App. Cas. 329, P. C. (a case decided on the now repealed M. S. Act, 1854, s. 189, re-enacted by the M. S. Act, 1894, s. 165)).

(u) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 165. As to admiralty jurisdiction, see title ADMIRALTY, Vol. I., p. 70. This provision has been applied where more than £50 has been claimed but less awarded, on the ground that the amount claimed but not awarded was claimed in virtue of a kind of contract over which the Court of Admiralty has not jurisdiction (The Harriet (1861), Lush. 285).

SECT. 4. Wages.

The Limitation Act, 1623 (a), applies to an admiralty action for seamen's wages (b).

SECT. 5.—Protection of Seamen from Imposition.

SUB-SECT. 1.—Assignment of Salvage and Wages.

Assignment of salvage and wages.

87. No assignment or sale of salvage (c) or wages (d) payable to a seaman or apprentice, made prior to the accruing thereof, binds the person making it; and a power of attorney or authority for the receipt thereof is not irrevocable, nor may a seaman abandon any right he may have or obtain in the nature of salvage (e), nor his right to wages in case of the loss of the ship, nor may he agree to be deprived of any remedy for the recovery of his wages which he would otherwise have had (f). A debt exceeding in amount 5*s.* incurred by any seaman after he has engaged to serve is not recoverable until the service agreed for is concluded (g).

SUB-SECT. 2.—Lodging-house Keepers.

Seamen's lodging-houses.

88. Bye-laws may be made either by a local authority or by the Board of Trade relating, inter alia, to the licensing, inspection, and sanitary conditions of seamen's lodging-houses (h). Fines may be imposed upon lodging-house keepers for charging seamen for a longer period than that for which the seaman has resided in the house, or for detaining money or effects in payment (i), or for soliciting a seaman on board the ship to become a lodger within twenty-four hours of the arrival of the ship at a home port (k), or for going on board for such purpose without leave when a ship is about to arrive, is arriving, or has arrived, at the end of her voyage (l). These provisions may be extended by Order in Council to ships belonging to a foreign country, where similar provisions exist in respect of British ships in such foreign country (m).

(e) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 212. This provision only applies to a sale of salvage made prior to the accruing thereof. Under ibid., s. 156 (1), a sale made after the service has been rendered is void (The Rosario (1876), 2 P. D. 41). An agreement to apportion is not void (see The Afrika (1880), 5 P. D. 192), but may be set aside if inequitable; see p. 573, post. These provisions do not affect vessels which, by the terms of the agreement, are to be employed on salvage service (M. S. SECT. 6.—Discharge of Seamen.

Discharge.

89. A seaman serving in a British foreign-going ship, when discharged at a home port, must be discharged in the presence of a superintendent, and a seamen serving in a home-trade ship may be so discharged, if the master or owner desires it (n). The master must under penalty sign and give to the seaman, either on his discharge or on payment of his wages, a certificate of discharge in approved form, specifying the period of service and the time and place of discharge, and must return to officers their certificates of competency (o). When a seaman is discharged before a superintendent, the master must make and sign in approved form a report of the conduct, character, and qualifications of the seaman discharged, or may state on the form that he declines to do so (p).

Foreign discharge.

90. A master discharging a seaman abroad must give him a certificate of discharge, and must return to a certificated officer whom he discharges abroad his certificate of competency (q). He may not, however, under penalty, discharge a seaman at all at any port outside the United Kingdom, except in the country where he was shipped, without the sanction of the proper authorities, and where the seaman is not discharged in the statutory manner, a certificate of the proper authority must be indorsed on the agreement with the crew, stating why the seaman is left behind (r).

extended to countries to which the Merchant Seamen (Payment of Wages and Rating) Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 16), formerly was extended by Order in Council (R. v. Abrahams, [1904] 2 K. B. 859). Orders in Council have been made in respect of the following countries:—Italy (2nd March, 1881); Norway and Sweden (25th October, 1881); Germany (30th November, 1882); United States of America (22nd May, 1883); Austria-Hungary (17th October, 1884); Denmark (15th September, 1887); Belgium (23rd July, 1889).

(n) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 127. A penalty of a fine not exceeding £10 attaches to failure to comply with these provisions (ibid.).

(o) Ibid., s. 128. No action lies in respect of the failure of a master to give a certificate of discharge (see Vallance v. Falle (1884), 13 Q. B. D. 109), but the court may apply any part of the penalty in compensating the seaman (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 699 (1)). The duty to grant this certificate is on the master alone, and not on the owners (Downie v. Connell Brothers, Ltd. [1910] S. C. 781). Where the seaman has wilfully or through misconduct failed to join the ship, the Board of Trade may order that his certificate of discharge shall be withheld for a period (M. S. Act, 1906, s. 65 (2)). For a form of certificate of discharge, see Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. XIV., p. 50.

(p) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 129. In the absence of malice an action for damages will not lie against a master for declining in accordance with this provision (Palace Shipping Co., Ltd. v. Caine, [1907] A. C. 386). Penalties attach to the making of a false report of character with knowledge of the falsity, and to the forgery or fraudulent alteration of such reports; see M. S. Act, 1894, s. 130; R. v. Wilson (James) (1858), Dears. & B. 558; and title CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE, Vol. IX., p. 753.

(q) M. S. Act, 1906, s. 31. The word "seamen" for this purpose includes "apprentices" (ibid., s. 49 (2)).

(r) Ibid., ss. 30, 36. As to the proper authorities, see note (e), p. 50, ante. A master failing to comply with these provisions is guilty of a misdemeanour, and the burden is on him to prove that sanction was obtained, or could not be obtained, or was unreasonably withheld (M. S. Act, 1906, ss. 30, 36); see title CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE, Vol. IX., pp. 556, 557. The certificates are not conclusive evidence of desertion (Lewis v. Jewhurst (1866), 15 L. T. 275).

SECT. 6. Discharge of Seamen, Sale of ship.

91. When a ship changes hands abroad, the seamen serving on her must be discharged, unless they consent in writing in the presence of the proper authorities to complete the voyage if continued (s).

SECT. 7.—Destitute and Distressed Seamen.

Foreign seaman in United Kingdom.

92. The master or owner of a ship who brings to the United Kingdom a native of Asia or Africa, or of any island in the South Sea or Pacific Ocean, and leaves him in the United Kingdom, is liable to a fine not exceeding £30, if within six months the person so left becomes chargeable on the poor rate, or commits any act by reason whereof he is liable to be convicted as an idle or disorderly person, or any other act of vagrancy (a).

Lascars.

93. It is the duty of the Secretary of State in Council for India to send home lascars or other natives of India found destitute in the United Kingdom, and to reimburse the British poor law authorities for any expenses incurred in connexion with such persons. The amount so paid by the Secretary of State constitutes a debt, for which the master and owner of the ship which brought such persons to the United Kingdom are jointly and severally liable (b).

Seamen abroad.

94. Where the service of a seaman serving on a British ship ends at a port out of British dominions, otherwise than by the consent of the seaman to be discharged during the currency of the agreement, the master must make provision for his maintenance and return to a proper return port. If the master fails to do this, the owner will be liable for the expenses incurred either by the seaman himself or by the authority or person which has defrayed the expenses of maintenance and of the return journey (c). These provisions apply where the seaman has refused to complete the voyage on the transfer or disposal of the ship abroad (d).

95. Seamen shipwrecked from a British ship, or discharged or left behind from a British ship and found in distress abroad, may

(c) M. S. Act, 1906, s. 32. Except for expenses defrayed by the seaman himself, the owner is not made liable by the statute if the seaman has been guilty of barratry (ibid.); as to barratry, see title CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE, Vol. IX., p. 789. A proper return port is either the port where the seaman was shipped, or a port in the country to which he belongs, or some other port agreed to by the seaman, in the case of a discharged seaman, at the time of his discharge, but in the case of a seaman belonging to a British possession, shipped and discharged out of the United Kingdom, a port in the United Kingdom may be treated as a proper return port (M. S. Act, 1906, s. 45). Ibid., ss. 31—33, take the place of the M. S. Act, 1894, s. 186; as to the interpretation of which see Edwards v. Steel, Young & Co., [1897] 2 Q. B. 327, C. An owner is responsible for the board, lodging, and conveyance home of a seaman discharged abroad, even though he was put ashore with a venereal disease (Board of Trade v. Anglo-American Oil Co., Ltd, [1911] 2 K. B. 225).

British subjects engaged to serve on foreign ships and found in distress abroad are entitled to similar relief (g).

Sailors' homes.

96. Certain public bodies may, with the consent of the Local Government Board, appropriate any land vested in them, or in trustees for them, as a site for a sailors' home (h).

SECT. 8.—Relief to Families of Seamen.

Charge for poor law relief.

97. When during the absence of a seaman on a voyage his wife or any of his children or step-children becomes chargeable on any union or parish in the United Kingdom, the union or parish is entitled to be reimbursed out of the wages of the seaman, up to an amount equal to one-half of the wages in the case of one member of the family becoming chargeable, and up to two-thirds in the case of two members. The reimbursement can, however, only extend to the balance of wages after any amounts paid under an allotment note have been deducted (i).

Enforcement of charge.

98. For the purpose of obtaining such reimbursements, the board of guardians, or a poor law union, or an inspector of the poor, may give notice to the owner of a ship to retain the required amount from the seaman's wages for a period not exceeding twenty-one days. During that time the money may be paid over on the order of a court of summary jurisdiction having jurisdiction in the union or parish seeking reimbursement, the court having power to reimburse for the whole amount claimed, or for any less sum, as it shall think fit. If no order for reimbursement is obtained within twenty-one days, the wages retained must be paid to the seaman (k).

(e) For definition of "proper authorities," see note (e), p. 50, ante. "Seamen" for this purpose includes apprentices (M. S. Act, 1906, s. 49 (2)).

(f) Ibid., s. 41. By ibid., s. 40, the Board of Trade has power to make regulations in regard to shipwrecked seamen and seamen in distress, known as the Distressed Seamen Regulations. Such regulations have been issued under Order in Council of the 9th April, 1908. Statutory provisions relating to the methods in which distressed seamen may be sent to a return port are contained in the M. S. Act, 1906, ss. 46—48. As regards the recovery of expenses in connexion with the return of distressed seamen, see ibid., s. 42. Agreements have been come to and published by Order in Council with regard to the treatment of distressed seamen with the following countries:—Austria-Hungary (26th November, 1880); Denmark (25th July, 1883); France (5th November, 1879); Germany (27th May, 1879); Italy (8th June, 1880); Sweden and Norway (12th July, 1881); see also M. S. Act, 1906, s. 41).

(g) The question whether a seaman is "in distress" is a question of fact (Board of Trade v. Sailing Ship Glenpark, [1904] 1 K. B. 682, C. A.). Distressed seamen are not "passengers" so as to make pilotage compulsory upon a ship carrying them (The Clymene, [1897] P. 295). A person belonging to a British ship who wrongfully forces a seaman on shore, or causes a seaman to be wrongfully left behind at any place, is guilty of a misdemeanour (M. S. Act, 1906, s. 43); see title CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE, Vol. IX., pp. 556, 557.

SECT. 9.
Property of Deceased Seamen.

SECT. 9.—Property of Deceased Seamen.

Death at sea.

99. When a seaman or apprentice on a British ship dies during a voyage which is to terminate in the United Kingdom, the master must take charge of his money and effects, and may sell the latter by auction. Full particulars must be entered in the official log, and the entry must be attested by the mate or by some member of the crew (l). The property must be delivered over to a superintendent on arrival at a home port, or to other officials in the case of foreign ports, and a certificate is granted in exchange, which must be produced before a foreign-going ship is cleared inwards (m).

Death abroad.

100. When a seaman dies abroad, not on board ship, his money and effects must be taken charge of by a chief officer of customs in the case of a British possession, or a British consular officer elsewhere, who may sell any part of the property, and must remit the rest, with the proceeds of sale, as the Board of Trade may require (n).

Death in United Kingdom.

101. When a seaman dies in the United Kingdom, the master must account for all property to the superintendent or to the Board of Trade (o).

Wills of seamen.

102. Where property of a deceased seaman or apprentice has come into the hands of the Board of Trade, the Board may refuse to recognise any will unless, if made on board ship, it is attested by the master, or first or only mate, and signed or acknowledged in the presence of one of them, or unless, if the will is not made on board ship, and the property is left to any person not related to the deceased by blood or marriage, the will is in writing, and is signed or acknowledged by the testator in the presence of, and is attested by two witnesses, one of whom is a superintendent, or minister of religion officiating in the place where the will is made, or where there are no such persons a justice, British consular officer, or an officer of customs (p).

Administration of effects.

103. Where property of a deceased seaman comes into the hands of the Board of Trade, the Board will, after deducting expenses, deal with the residue thus :—If the property exceeds £100 in value, it will be paid to the personal representative of the deceased; if it does not exceed £100, it may be paid to any person proved (l) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 169. "Effects" includes clothes and documents (ibid., s. 742); "during the voyage" does not include time after a vessel has been wrecked (Stephens v. Duncan (1862), 1 Macph. (Ct. of Sess.) 146). As to the official log, see pp. 82, 83, post.

(m) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 170. The master may be fined an amount not exceeding treble the amount of the property not accounted for, or, if such value is not ascertained, not exceeding £50, for not taking charge of or not delivering over the deceased seaman's property (ibid., s. 171). In the case of a sailor belonging to one of His Majesty's ships being sent home in a merchantman and dying on the way, his property is at the disposal of the Accountant-General of the Navy (ibid., s. 181).

(n) Both ships of which the voyages terminate in the United Kingdom and ships of which the voyages terminate abroad are included in this provision (M. S. Acts, 1894, ss. 172, 173; 1906, s. 29).

(o) M. S. Acts, 1894, s. 175; 1906, s. 29.

(p) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 177 (1). If the will be void under this provision the property is dealt with as though there were no will (ibid., s. 177 (2)); see titles EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS, Vol. XIV., p. 162; WILLS.

SECT. 9. Property of Deceased Seamen.

to be the widow or child of the deceased, or a person entitled under the will, or a person entitled to take out representation. The Board may, at its discretion, require administration to be taken out for this purpose (q).

Creditors' claims.

104. Creditors claiming upon the property of a deceased seaman must state the particulars of their claim in proper form, and verify them by statutory declaration. No creditor is entitled to claim any part of the property by virtue of representation obtained as creditor, nor in respect of a debt which has accrued more than three years before the death of the deceased, nor unless a demand is made within two years after the death. A creditor may proceed against a widow, next of kin, or legatee, to whom the Board of Trade has delivered over any property of the deceased, as if she or he had received the property as legal personal representative of the deceased. Payment to the creditor may be delayed for a year, whether he has proved the debt to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade or not (r).

Offences and penalties.

105. Any person who for the purpose of obtaining any property of any deceased seaman or apprentice, either for himself or any other person, has any guilty connexion with the forgery or fraudulent alteration of any document, or the giving of false evidence, or the making of false representations, or the procuring of false evidence, is liable to imprisonment (s).

SECT. 10.—Discipline.

SUB-SECT. 1.—Authority of Master.

Master's powers.

106. A master may, apart from the powers conferred upon him by statute, take all reasonable means to preserve discipline in the ship (t).

Deserters.

107. At a home port a deserter from a British ship, or an absentee without leave, may be taken on board by force, but if he so requires, he must first be taken before some competent court (a). At a foreign port the seaman may be arrested without warrant, so far as the local laws permit, but must also be given the opportunity

(r) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 178; see title LIMITATION OF ACTIONS, Vol. XIX., p. 181. Where no claim is received within six years the Board of Trade has power to give the property to a subsequent claimant or pay it to the Treasury (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 179; and see M. S. Act, 1898).

(s) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 180. The penalty is penal servitude not exceeding five years, or imprisonment not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, or, on summary conviction, imprisonment not exceeding six months, with or without hard labour (ibid.); see title CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE, Vol. IX., p. 753.

(t) Lima (1837), 3 Hag. Adm. 346. The master has also the power to alter the rating of a seaman in the course of a voyage (Hicks v. Walker (1856), 4 W. R. 511; Hanson v. Royden (1867), L. R. 3 C. P. 47). So far as the provisions of the M. S. Acts are concerned, "master" includes every person, except a pilot, having command or charge of any ship (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 742). The master of a merchant ship is entitled to the assistance of His Majesty's officers in maintaining discipline; see title CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, Vol. VI., p. 436.

(a) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 222.

SECT. 10. Discipline.

of appearing before a court (b). Similar provisions may be applied by Order in Council to seamen of vessels belonging to foreign countries (c).

SUB-SECT. 2.—General Duties of Seamen.

Duties of seamen.

108. A seaman is not bound to perform any services other than those stipulated for in his contract of service (d). He will, however, be required to perform duties which, although not specifically stipulated for, are reasonably incidental to a seafaring life. Thus, the seaman must navigate the ship in all sorts of weather (e), conduct himself in a properly respectful manner towards his superiors (f), and assist with the working of the cargo in ports of call (g).

SUB-SECT. 3.—Offences against Discipline.

Offences against discipline.

109. A seaman lawfully engaged, or an apprentice, if he quits the ship without leave after her arrival at her port of delivery before she is placed in security, is liable to be punished summarily by the forfeiture of a sum not exceeding one month's pay; if he is guilty of wilful disobedience to a lawful command, he is liable to imprisonment for not more than four weeks or to forfeit two days' pay; if he is guilty of continued wilful disobedience to lawful commands (h), or continued wilful neglect of duty, he is liable to imprisonment for not more than twelve weeks or to forfeit a sum not exceeding six days' pay in respect of each day's disobedience or neglect of duty, or to the expenses of hiring a substitute; if he assaults the master or a mate or a certificated engineer, he is liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve weeks;

(b) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 223.

(c) Ibid., s. 238.

(d) Thus, a seaman who has agreed to serve on an ordinary voyage is not bound to continue to serve when the voyage has become extraordinary, as when the risk ceases to be a commercial risk by reason of the carriage of contraband (Burton v. Pinkerton (1867), L. R. 2 Exch. 340; O'Neil v. Armstrong, Mitchell & Co., [1895] 2 Q. B. 418, C. A.; Lloyd v. Sheen (1905), 10 Asp. M. L. C. 75; Austin Friars Steam Shipping Co. v. Strack, Same v. Strack, [1905] 2 K. B. 315; Palace Shipping Co., Ltd. v. Caine, [1907] A. C. 386; Collins v. Simpson Steamship Co. (1907), 24 T. L. R. 178, C. A.), or the voyage is extended beyond the time and scope agreed upon (Eliza (1823), 1 Hag. Adm. 182; Countess of Harcourt (1824), 1 Hag. Adm. 248; Minerva (1825), 1 Hag. Adm. 347; George Home (1825), 1 Hag. Adm. 370; The Westmorland (1841), 1 Wm. Rob. 216; Donkin v. Hastie (1897), 61 J. P. 568), or where there is a shortage of provisions (Castilia (1822), 1 Hag. Adm. 59). As to when a voyage will be deemed to be terminated, see Haylett v. Thompson, [1911] 1 K. B. 311. The voyage to be considered is the "voyage of the ship," not the voyage of the cargo (The Scarsdale, [1906] P. 103, C. A.). Where the agreement is reasonable, the crew may be bound by an agreement to accept half wages in the event of certain contingencies (Hoghton (1833), 3 Hag. Adm. 100). Any contract may be rescinded by the court upon such terms as it thinks just (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 168). For other cases relating to interpretation of seamen's contracts, see Frazer v. Hatton (1857), 2 C. B. (N. S.) 512.

(e) Neptune (1824), 1 Hag. Adm. 227.

(f) Lowther Castle (1825), 1 Hag. Adm. 384.

(g) Cambridge (1829), 2 Hag. Adm. 243.

(h) As to what may constitute this offence, see Caroe v. Bayliss (1908), 25 T. L. R. 22; as to fishing vessels, see M. S. Act, 1894, s. 376; and Edgill v. Alward (J. & G.), Ltd., [1902] 2 K. B. 239. For riots by seamen etc., see Shipping Offences Act, 1793 (33 Geo. 3, c. 67), ss. 1, 3, 4; and title CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE, Vol. IX., p. 473.

if he combines with any of the crew to disobey lawful commands, or to neglect duty, or to impede the navigation of the ship or the progress of the voyage, he is liable to imprisonment for not more than twelve weeks; if he wilfully damages the ship, or embezzles or wilfully damages stores or cargo, he is liable to imprisonment for not more than twelve weeks, and also to forfeit a sum equal to the loss sustained; if he is convicted of smuggling, he is liable to make good to the master or owner any loss caused (i).

Desertion and absence without leave.

110. A seaman guilty of desertion is liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve weeks, to forfeit all effects left on board, all wages earned, and all wages he may earn in any other ship until his next return to the United Kingdom, and to satisfy any excess of wages paid for a substitute (j).

Persuading to desert and harbouring deserters.

A penalty attaches to persuading or attempting to persuade a seaman or apprentice to desert from his ship (k), or otherwise to absent himself from his duty, and also to wilfully harbouring seamen or apprentices who have deserted or absented themselves from duty (l).

Absence without leave.

A seaman is guilty of being absent without leave if he neglects or refuses without reasonable cause to join or proceed to sea in his ship, or is absent without leave at any time within twenty-four hours of the ship's sailing from port, or is otherwise absent from duty in circumstances which do not amount to, or are not treated as amounting to, desertion (m).

(i) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 225. This section contains the offences which are "offences against discipline" under the Act. It only applies to sea-going vessels; see M. S. Act, 1894, s. 260; Salt Union v. Wood, [1893] 1 Q. B. 370. The offence may be punished summarily (ibid., s. 243). Where a fine has been imposed upon a seaman for an act of misconduct under his agreement, he cannot be otherwise punished under the Merchant Shipping Acts (M. S. Act, 1906, s. 44 (5)). Despite the punishments imposed by statute upon offences against discipline, desertion, or absence without leave, the master may sue for breach of contract in respect of such offences (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 225, overruling Great Northern Fishing Co. v. Edgehill (1883), 11 Q. B. D. 225). As to smuggling, see title CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE, Vol. IX., pp. 522, 523.

(j) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 221 (a). The desertion must be from a British ship (Leary v. Lloyd (1860), 3 E. & E. 178). As to what constitutes desertion, see Sigard v. Roberts (1799), 3 Esp. 71; Limland v. Stephens (1801), 3 Esp. 269; Neave v. Pratt (1807), 2 Bos. & P. (N. Expenses caused by desertion may be deducted from wages, see p. 49, ante.

(k) The ship may be "his ship" before the seaman has signed articles if he has contracted to serve on her (Vickerson v. Crow (1913), 30 T. L. R. 111).

(l) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 236. The penalty for enticing to desert is a fine not exceeding £10, and for harbouring deserters not exceeding £20 (ibid.). It is immaterial whether all the statutory formalities have been observed in the engagement of the seamen (Austin v. Olsen (1868), L. R. 3 Q. B. 208; see also Thomson v. Hart (1890), 28 Sc. L. R. 28). Persons other than seamen may also be proceeded against for this offence under the Conspiracy, and Protection of Property Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 86); see Kennedy v. Cowie, [1891] 1 Q. B. 771; R. v. Lynch, [1898] 1 Q. B. 61, C. C. R.; Farmer v. Wilson (1900), 69 L. J. (Q. B.) 496. M. S. Act, 1894, s. 236, does not apply to foreign vessels (Poll v. Dambe, [1901] 2 K. B. 579).

(m) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 221 (b). This offence renders the seaman liable to imprisonment for not more than ten weeks, to forfeiture of a sum not

SECT. 10. Discipline.

Foreign ships.

Where it appears that facilities are given by a foreign country in respect of the recovery and apprehension of deserters from British merchant ships, the same powers may be conferred upon courts, justices, or officers in regard to the apprehension of seamen deserting from ships belonging to that country as they possess in regard to the apprehension of British seamen (a).

SUB-SECT. 4.—Other Offences.

False statements.

111. A seaman may be fined for wilfully and fraudulently making a false statement of the name of his last ship, or of his own name, on or before being engaged (b).

Stowaways.

Stowaways may be taken before a court without warrant and sentenced to fine or imprisonment. While on board a ship they are for the purposes of discipline treated as members of the crew (c).

Barratry.

A master or a member of a crew who wilfully commits a wrongful act to the prejudice of the owner or charterer is guilty of barratry (d).

Piracy.

Piracy, which is an offence in the nature of barratry, has been the subject of special legislative enactment (e).

Wilfully endangering ship.

112. A master, seaman, or apprentice belonging to a British ship who by wilful breach of duty, or by neglect of duty, or by reason of drunkenness, does any act tending to the immediate loss, destruction, or serious damage of the ship, or tending immediately to endanger the life or limb of a person belonging to or on board the ship, or refuses or omits to do any lawful act proper and requisite to the exceeding two days' pay, and for every twenty-four hours' absence either to a sum not exceeding six days' pay or any expenses incurred in hiring a substitute (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 221 (b)). The unseaworthiness of the vessel is an answer to a charge of desertion or of absence without leave (ibid., s. 463). No stipulations which are at variance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts may be inserted in the agreement with the crew in respect of this offence (Mercantile Steamship Co. v. Hall, [1909] 2 K. B. 423). For offences on fishing boats etc., see M. S. Act, 1894, ss. 376—384; title FISHERIES, Vol. XIV., pp. 632, 633.

(a) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 238. Orders have been made in respect of the following countries:—Austria-Hungary (16th October, 1852); Belgium (8th February, 1855); Brazil (17th November, 1888); Columbia (28th December, 1866); Congo Free State (10th August, 1888); Denmark (15th July, 1881); Ecuador (24th September, 1886); France (3rd July, 1854); Germany (18th March, 1880); Greece (12th July, 1887); Honduras (26th September, 1901); Italy (11th June, 1863); Japan (9th October, 1903); Mexico (28th May, 1889); Morocco and Fez (6th May, 1857); (Netherlands (9th March, 1854); Nicaragua (1st March, 1907); Paraguay (29th December, 1887); Peru (18th August, 1852); Roumania (29th February, 1908); Russia (27th August, 1860); Salvador (11th June, 1863); Siam (10th November, 1866); Spain (23rd January, 1860); Sweden and Norway (8th August, 1852); Turkey (18th May, 1865); United States of America (18th August, 1892); Uruguay (24th September, 1886); Zanzibar (7th March, 1887).

(d) See the definitions contained in the Marine Insurance Act, 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), Sched. I (1), which sums up the effect of previous decisions; see Earle v. Rowcroft (1806), 8 East, 126; title INSURANCE, Vol. XVII., pp. 444, 445. Certain forms of barratry have been made punishable by statute; thus, any person who unlawfully and maliciously sets fire, casts away, or in anywise destroys any ship is guilty of felony (Malicious Damage Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97); see also M. S. Act, 1894, s. 220; title CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE, Vol. IX., pp. 789, 790.

preservation of the ship or the safety of those on board her, is guilty of a misdemeanour (f).

SUB-SECT. 5.—Entry of Offences.

Logging.

113. Every statutory offence must be entered in the official log, and signed by the master and mate or one of the crew, and the entry must be read over to the offender if still in the ship, or a copy of the entry furnished to him. A statement of his reply must also be entered and similarly signed (g). Where a seaman deserts in a foreign port, the entry showing desertion must be produced to a person authorised to grant certificates for leaving seamen behind abroad, who will make and certify a copy of the entry, and send it home for registration by the Registrar-General of shipping and seamen (h). A list of deserters is kept by superintendents (i).

SECT. 11.—Seamen Volunteering for Royal Navy.

Seaman joining Royal Navy.

114. A seaman may leave his ship in order to enter the Royal Navy and will not be deemed to have deserted therefrom or be liable to any punishment or forfeiture. Any stipulation in an agreement inconsistent with this provision is void, and the master or owner introducing such a stipulation is liable to a penalty (k).

SECT. 12.—Registration and Returns Respecting Seamen.

General Register and Record Office.

115. An office is maintained in London under the control of the Board of Trade, known as the General Register and Record Office of Seamen (l). It is supervised by the Registrar-General of Shipping and Seamen, who keeps a record of all persons who serve in ships, together with various particulars concerning them (m). To enable him to do so lists of the crews serving on home trade ships, and on foreign-going ships whose crews are discharged in the United Kingdom, must be transmitted through superintendents (n) after the arrival of the ship at her final home port of destination in the United Kingdom, or upon discharge of the crew, whichever happens first, together with various particulars relating to their services and other matters (o).

Lists of seamen must also be returned where a transfer of

The act need only "tend" to loss or destruction, and may be within this provision although there is no actual damage (R. v. Gardner (1859), 1 F. & F. 669); see title CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE, Vol. IX., p. 558.

(g) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 228. In any subsequent legal proceedings for offences these entries must be produced in evidence, or the court may refuse to receive other evidence (ibid.); and see title EVIDENCE, Vol. XIII., p. 542; see also pp. 82, 83, post.

To bring the seaman within this provision it seems he must have left his ship with the bonâ fide intention of joining the Royal Navy (The Amphitrite (1832), 2 Hag. Adm. 403). ownership or a change in the employment of the ship takes place, or if the ship be lost or abandoned (p). Further returns must be made of all births, marriages, and deaths taking place on a British ship (q).

When a cargo boat stops forty-eight hours in a port in a British dominion, the master must deliver to the chief officer of customs or consular officer the agreement with the crew, and all indentures and assignments of apprenticeships, to be kept during the ship's stay in port. The officer receiving the documents must report any irregularity to the Registrar-General (r).

Ship's papers.

116. Where a master relinquishes his position during a voyage, he must, under penalty, deliver to his successor the various documents relating to the navigation and crew of the ship, and his successor must, immediately he assumes command of the ship, enter in the official log a list of the documents so delivered to him (s).

Part IV.—Authority and Liability of Master as Custodian of Ship and Cargo.

SECT. 1.—General Authority as to Contracts for Employment of Ship.

Authority of master.

117. As owners rarely navigate a trading ship by themselves, the management of it is generally entrusted to the master, and he is their confidential servant or agent to perform all things relating to the usual employment of the ship. His authority is very large, and extends to all acts that are usual and necessary for the use and employment of the ship, but it is subject to certain limitations (a). Thus the master may make a charter in his own name so as to bind his owners, if this is done at a foreign port and there is a difficulty in communicating with his owners, and it is made in the usual course of the ship's employment, and in circumstances that do not afford evidence of fraud; or if it is made at the ship's home port in circumstances which afford evidence of the assent of the owners (b), provided that in making a contract for the hire of the ship he does not substitute it for a contract already made by his owner (c).

He has a general implied authority by maritime usage to contract to carry goods on freight, but not freight free, and he may sign bills of lading for goods put on board, and acknowledge the weight, value, and condition of such goods, and if a more limited authority is given, a party not informed of the limitation is not affected (d).

SECT. 1. General Authority as to Contracts for Employment of Ship.

Contracts and warranties made by the master in the course of the usual employment of the ship are in law deemed to have been made by the owner, but the master is also liable; and the merchant has a remedy against both of them (e).

Liability of master.

The master is personally responsible for any injury or loss to the ship or cargo by reason of his negligence or misconduct or his acting without authority (f).

He is in the position of a trustee for his owner, and is bound to account for all profits made by the ship while under his command (g).

SECT. 2.—Limitations on General Authority.

How authority is limited.

118. The master's implied authority to contract for the hire of the ship in a foreign port is limited to cases where neither his owners nor their agents in that respect are present and there is difficulty in communicating with them (h).

Authority to alter contract.

When the owners have made a contract for the hire of the ship the master may not annul it and substitute another (i), nor accept less than a substantial performance of the contract (k). Though in slight matters he may vary it (l), he cannot bind his owners to carry freight free (m), nor contract with the freighter to carry at a lower freight than that agreed upon with the owner (n), nor authorise (d) Grant v. Norway (1851), 10 C. B. 665. The owner is bound by the representation of the master that goods are shipped in good order and condition (Compania Naviera Vasconzada v. Churchill and Sim, Same v. Burton & Co., [1906] 1 K. B. 237); but as to quality when distinct from condition, see ibid., at pp. 245, 246, and p. 155, post. When cargo is partly shipped but the charterers fail, the master may contract with the charterers' agents as third parties to ship the rest of the cargo at a less freight, this being the best course for his owners (Pearson v. Göschen (1864), 17 C. its payment in an unusual manner (o); neither may he salve property whilst a ship is under a charter which does not give him leave to do this (p).

The master's duty is to obey his owner's instructions, and when these are silent he is to do nothing not consonant to the law of the land, because obedience to the law is implied in his instructions (q).

Limitation of authority by owner.

Besides the above limitation imposed on the master's implied authority to bind his owner, the owner may limit or extend it as he pleases (r), but when this is done to an unusual extent third persons dealing with the master without notice are not affected thereby, for the owner must give clear notice of his intention to limit the master's authority (s). When a person has notice of some limitation of the master's authority, he may still treat him as having all the ordinary authority of a master in all matters not affected by the limitation imposed (t).

SECT. 3.—Authority of Master as to Necessaries.

SUB-SECT. 1.—Authority to make Owner Liable.

Necessaries.

119. The power of the master to subject the owner (u) to pay for necessaries for the ship, such as repairs to the hull, the price of stores and provisions supplied for its use, or to repay money advanced for these purposes, is sometimes direct, furnishing an action against the owners personally, sometimes indirect, to be prosecuted by a suit against the ship (v). The master is himself personally bound by any contract for necessaries made by him, unless by express terms he confines the credit to his owner only (a), but contracts made by the owner himself, or in circumstances which

Where the owner decides to send a vessel on a voyage that might be dangerous because of quarrels between foreign countries, the master must not substitute another voyage instead of obeying his orders (The Roebuck (1874), 2 Asp. M. L. C. 387).

(r) The Edmond (1860), Lush. 57 (appointing some person to collect the freight or procure a freight for another voyage); compare The Fanny, The Mathilda (1883), 5 Asp. M. L. C. 75, 79, C. A. Without authority the master may not insure, as this is not a matter of necessity (The Serafina (1864), Brown. & Lush. 277).

(s) Grant v. Norway (1851), 10 C. B. 665; Manchester Trust, Ltd. v. Furness, Withy & Co. (1895), 8 Asp. M. L. C. 57, C. A. (the insertion of "other conditions as per charterparty" in a bill of lading is not sufficient evidence that the master is signing as agent for charterers and not on the owner's behalf).

(t) Weston v. Wright (1841), 7 M. & W. 396.

(u) The term "owner" is here used as meaning the person from whom the master derives his authority and whose agent he is.

show that credit was given to him alone, give no right of action against the master (b).

The owner is bound by every contract made by the master for necessaries, if either it is within his actual authority or the owner has held him out as having authority to make such contract, and the owner continues so bound even after he has sold the ship, until the master is apprised of the sale (c).

Scope of master's authority.

120. The master's implied authority to order necessaries is limited to ordering such things as are actually necessary, and if a person trusts him for a thing not necessary, he trusts him for that which is not within the scope of his authority to order (d). Consequently, in order to raise a presumption of authority (e), creditors must prove that the things ordered were necessary, and that it was reasonably necessary that the master should obtain or order them on the owner's credit (f).

The master has no authority to bind his owner in any part of the world if the owner or his properly authorised agent can personally do what is required, but if the ship be at a foreign port where the owner has no agent, or at a home port at a distance from the owner's residence, and necessaries are required to be promptly provided, the master may pledge his owner's credit (g).

Advance by master.

121. If the master himself advances money of his own for the necessary purposes of the ship's outfit, or if he incurs any expenses in or through the performance of his duties which were not contemplated at the time of his engagement as expenses to be defrayed by him, he can recover them from his owner (h).

SUB-SECT. 2.—Authority to make Ship Liable.

C.); see also The Pacific (1864), Brown. & Lush.

ship (k) elsewhere (l) than in the port to which the ship belongs, can institute an action in the Admiralty Court and arrest the ship to enforce his claim, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that at the time of the institution of the cause any owner or part owner is domiciled (m) in England or Wales.

Though it is only in the instances given above that the person supplying necessaries has a direct claim on the ship, yet when he has supplied the necessaries on the order of the master he may succeed in making the ship available for the satisfaction of his debt, by proceeding against the master upon his personal liability for the necessaries ordered (n), and so force him to exercise the maritime lien that a master has by statute for his liabilities and disbursements (o).

123. This lien of the master only arises in cases where the disbursements or liabilities are made or incurred by him when acting as master and entitled to pledge his owner's credit (p), for he has no authority to fix a liability upon the ship which he had not the owner's authority to incur, or which was not necessary for the protection of his interest (q). Even when the owner has given the master power to pledge his credit, no lien is created in his favour unless it was necessary that the necessaries should be supplied and he could not have recourse to his owner before ordering them (r).

SUB-SECT. 3.—What are Necessaries.

Meaning of "necessaries."

124. The term "necessaries" includes anchors, cables, rigging, and matters of that description (s), coals (t), provisions and clothing

243. For the history of the contention, see Abbott on Shipping, 14th ed., pp. 177—184. As to what are "necessaries," see the text, infra.

(k) This includes a foreign as well as a British ship (The Mecca, [1895] P. 95, C. A.).

(l) Whether on the high seas or not (The Mecca, supra, per LINDLEY, L.J., at p. 108).

(m) Absence from the country does not affect domicil if there is an intention to return (The Pacific (1864), Brown. & Lush. 243). As to domicil generally, see title CONFLICT OF LAWS, Vol. VI., pp. 182 et seq. As to the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Division over claims for necessaries, see title ADMIRALTY, Vol. I., pp. 67, 68.

(n) Hussey v. Christie (1808), 9 East, 426. It is useless to proceed against the master when the goods were ordered by the owner or in circumstances that show they were given on the credit of the owner alone (Hoskins v. Slayton (1737), Lee temp. Hard. 376; Farmer v. Davies (1786), 1 Term Rep. 108), or when the owner has been unsuccessfully sued to judgment (Priestly v. Fernie (1865), 3 H. & C. 977; Curtis v. Williamson (1874), L. R. 10 Q. B. 57).

Thus, when the charterers were bound to provide the coal, no lien for disbursement is created in favour of the master so as to be enforced against the ship if he provides the money or orders the coal, for it was outside his authority to pledge the owner's credit in this respect (ibid.; The Turgot (1886), 11 P. for the crew (a), copper sheathing (b), screw propeller (c), money advanced to pay for necessaries (d), and to pay off a shipwright's lien (e), towage and dock dues (f), and insurance on freight (g), and such repairs and other things as the owner as a prudent man would have ordered if he had been present at the time (h).

Though the supplies come within the category of necessary things for a ship, yet a person who supplies them must show that they were necessary for the ship at the time, and, if it is proved that there were other things of the same description on board, he must prove that they were not sufficient (i).

SECT. 4.—Authority to Hypothecate Ship and Freight.

Bottomry bonds.

125. The master has authority in the circumstances mentioned hereafter (k) to pledge the ship and freight to raise the necessary funds for the voyage (l). This is effected by the master contracting with the lender by a contract called "bottomry," the bottom or keel of the ship being figuratively used to express the whole body thereof.

Form.

There is no settled form for the bottomry contract; it generally takes the form of a bond (m) whereby the master states the occasion for resorting to bottomry and pledges himself, the ship and freight,

(m) For a form, see Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. XIV., p. 65; Menetone v. Gibbons (1789), 3 Term Rep. 267. Sometimes it takes the form of a bill of sale; see Johnson v. Shippen (1703), 2 Ld. Raym. 982. Bills of exchange drawn by the master on the owner as security for money advanced to the master, though accompanied by a verbal agreement that the ship shall be pledged, are not instruments of bottomry (Ex parte Halkett (1814), 3 Ves. & B. 135; Miller & Co. v. Potter, Wilson & Co. (1875), 3 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 105). Bottomry bonds have been described as of "a high and privileged nature," "favoured instruments" to be liberally protected (The Alexander (1812), 1 Dods. 278; Kennersley Castle (1833), 3 Hag. Adm. 1, 7; and sometimes the cargo (n), for the repayment of the principal and interest on the safe arrival of the ship at the end of her voyage on such conditions as to risk as may be agreed upon (o).

SECT. 4. Authority to Hypothecate Ship and Freight.

Essentials of bottomry bonds.

126. Bottomry bonds were invented for the purpose of procuring the necessary supplies for ships which may happen to be in distress in foreign ports where the master and owner are without credit, and where, unless assistance can be secured by means of such an instrument, the ships and their cargoes must perish. Accordingly the master, before he can resort to this expedient for raising money, must be satisfied that the necessity to do so has arisen in the course of the voyage, or when the vessel is in a foreign port (p), and that it is necessary to hypothecate the ship itself to obtain the necessary supplies (q). The loan to be made must be to provide such supplies as are reasonably necessary for the ship during the particular voyage on which she will be engaged (r), and therefore, if an unduly large sum is borrowed, the bond will only be valid for such portion of it as was justified by necessity (s).

A bottomry bond is no security for any liability of the owner or master incurred before the bond was given, unless by the law of the port at which the ship is she can be arrested and sold for such liability, and funds may be necessary to enable the ship to continue her voyage (t). Neither can it can be made a security for an old debt of the owner in respect of another ship, or the same ship on a previous voyage, at the same or any other place (a).

Reliance (1833), 3 Hag. Adm. 66, 74); but see Vibilia (1838), 1 Wm. Rob. 1, 5; The "Mary Ann" (1846), 4 Notes of Cases, 376. As to the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Division over bottomry actions, see title ADMIRALTY, Vol. I., pp. 65 et seq.

(n) As to hypothecation of cargo, see pp. 240 et seq., post.

(o) The bond is not invalid for want of an exact description of the voyage if the voyage is not under the control of the person who grants the bond (The Jane (1814), 1 Dods. 461). If the rate of interest is not mentioned the bond is still good, and the court will allow such interest as the risk should command (The Cecilie (1879), 4 P. D. 210; The Change (1857), Sw. 240; and see title MONEY AND MONEY-LENDING, Vol. XXI., p. 42). The master has no authority to contract that a higher rate of interest shall be paid after the bond is due so as to ensure punctual payment (The Sophia Cook (1878), 4 P. D. 30; The D. H. Bills (1878), 4 P. D. 32, n.). See title ADMIRALTY, Vol. I., pp. 66, 67.

SECT. 4. Authority to Hypothecate Ship and Freight.

As there is no authority to pledge the ship for old debts she cannot be pledged to pay for supplies or repairs which have already been furnished on the credit of the owner (b), or otherwise than on the credit of the ship (c), nor at any time while anyone can be found to furnish the supplies on the personal credit of the owner (d).

Communication to owner.

Another essential before the master resorts to bottomry is that he must when possible communicate with his owner (e), or attempt to do so if in the circumstances it is rational to expect that he may have an answer within a time not inconvenient having regard to the circumstances of the case (f). The communication must state the necessity for raising the loan and the necessity for doing so by bottomry, and should be by telegraph if practicable (g).

Sea risk.

It is essential also to the validity of the bond that the lender should undertake sea risk (h), and that this must be expressed or implied from the instrument (i).

LUSHINGTON was of opinion that the master might raise a second bond to pay off a first bond given on the same voyage (The Toivo (1853), 1 Ecc. & Ad. 185; see also The Catherine, formerly The Croxdale (1851), 15 Jur. 231).

(c) The Empire of Peace (1869), 39 L. J. (ADM.) 12 (on credit of owners and freight). A presumption that the advance was on the credit of the ship and not of the owners is raised by the fact that the creditors have a lien on the ship which they can enforce (Vibilia (1838), 1 Wm. Rob. 1, 6; The Laurel (1863), Brown. & Lush. 191; The Augusta (1813), 1 Dods. 283), or that the owners were bankrupt to the knowledge of the creditors at the time of the advance (The Osmanli (1850), 3 Wm. Rob. 198), or that they had assigned unearned freight to which in the ordinary course the master could have had recourse (The Edmond (1860), Lush. 57).

(d) Soares v. Rahn, The Prince of Saxe Cobourg (1838), 3 Moo. P. C. C. 1; The Faithful (1862), 31 L. J. (P. M. & A.) 81. A bond given after the lender knew the owner had an agent at the port is void (Lyall v. Hicks (1859), 27 Beav. 616).

(e) The notice must be given even though the owner is insolvent, and, if a bankrupt, the notice should be given to his trustee (Wallace v. Fielden, The "Oriental" (1851), 7 Moo. P. C. C. 398; Barron v. Stewart, The "Panama" (1870), L. R. 3 P. C. 199); but there is no obligation to communicate with mortgagees (The Helgoland (1859), Sw. 491).

(f) La Ysabel (1812), 1 Dods. 273; Wallace v. Fielden, The "Oriental," supra; The Hamburg (1864), Brown. & Lush. 253, 273, P. C.

(g) Wallace v. Fielden, The "Oriental," supra; The Olivier (1862), Lush. 484; The Karnak, supra.

(h) By "sea risk" is meant that the lender shall have no claim if the vessel is lost on the voyage. If the loan bears interest at current rate for a land risk, it is some evidence that the lender did not intend to undertake sea risk (The Haabet, [1899] P. 295); but when maritime risk is involved the absence of maritime interest, the presence of collateral stipulations as to repayment, and the insurance of the loan does not make the instrument a void bond (The Dora Forster, [1900] P. 241); see title ADMIRALTY, Vol. I., pp. 66, 67.

(i) The Emancipation (1840), 1 Wm. Rob. 124; The Indomitable (1859), Sw. 446; Stainbank v. Shepard (1853), 17 Jur. 1032, Ex. Ch.; The Cecile (1879), 4 Asp. M. L. C. 78; Aldrich v. Cooper (1803), 8 Ves. 382. The reason for sea risk being essential was because otherwise the laws against usury would be infringed. Though these are now repealed it is still essential, because the law is against liens being created on a ship which do not appear on the ship's papers (The Royal Arch (1857), Sw. 269); so if the bond is to cover insurance it is disallowed to that extent, on the ground that it would relieve the lender of the risk he had undertaken (Boddingtons (1832), 2 Hag. Adm. 422), and if the effect of such a stipulation is to negative sea risk on the part of the lender the bond is void (The Indomitable, supra).

SECT. 4. Authority to Hypothecate Ship and Freight.

Who may advance money.

127. Any person may advance money on bottomry provided he is not a debtor to the ship, but even in that case he may do so to the extent of any excess over his indebtedness (k). Thus the consignee of the cargo (l) and the agent of the shipowner may lend, but if the latter lends he is bound to superintend the expenditure of the loan to protect the owner from error or malfeasance of the master and to see that the money is applied to necessary expenses (a).

Pledging the freight.

128. The master can pledge the freight whenever he can pledge the ship (b), and when no freight is due from the charterers but they are entitled to sub-freight from cargo owners, this may be hypothecated (c). Freight to be earned on cargo which will not be shipped until after the bond becomes due cannot be pledged, because the lender does not incur sea risk in respect of it (d). As to what freight may be pledged, it has been held that when the bottomry bond is given in the course of a voyage, only freight at risk can be pledged, and the charterer is entitled to deduct any advances properly made and the premiums for insuring such advances although made before the necessity for bottomry arises (e).

The charterer is not bound to pay freight on goods sold during the voyage (f), but he cannot deduct the price of goods sold on the voyage after the bond was given (g).

When bond payable.

129. As a general rule a bottomry bond does not become payable until the voyage for which it is given is completed (h), but if, after setting forth, the completion of the voyage is prevented by the act of the master, or by some impossibility which the bondholder cannot control (i), or if the voyage is abandoned or cannot be performed, the bond becomes due (j). If the vessel is totally lost, the bond is void by its terms, but if any part is saved the bond can be enforced against it (k). If the ship is lost by the wrongful act of another ship, the bondholder may recover against that ship, and, if she limits her liability, can share in the fund with the other claimants (l).

How enforced.

130. As soon as it becomes due the bond should be enforced (m), and this can be done by arrest of the ship by the Admiralty Court, and, if necessary, by a sale of the ship by the court (n). If not enforced within a reasonable time, the bondholder risks losing his priority (o), and the bond cannot be renewed for a new voyage (p).

Before declaring for the validity of a bond the Admiralty Court will inquire into the reasonableness of the charge for payment of which the bond was given (q), and in extreme cases will reduce the amount of interest undertaken to be paid (r). From the time a bond becomes due until paid the court allows interest at the current rate, if there has been anybody in this country capable of giving the ship a good discharge (s).

Negotiability.

131. Bottomry bonds are negotiable instruments, and the assignee is in the same position as the original holder (a). These bonds are sometimes given as collateral security to bills of exchange (b). If the bills are accepted by the owner of the ship, the bond is discharged, and he escapes paying maritime interest (c). The lender has a double security, for in the event of dishonour of the bills he could enforce the bonds with maritime interest. The fact that the bills of exchange were for the same debt does not invalidate the bond, as the shipowner was not liable until he accepted the bills, though in certain cases this might be evidence that the bond was not given on the security of the ship (d).

(m) The Rebecca (1804), 5 Ch. Rob. 102; The Eudora (1879), 4 P. D. 208. It cannot be enforced before (ibid.). A bond is not discharged by a settlement of accounts between the shipowner and the charterer, whereby the latter is to pay the bond, to which settlement the bondholder's agent who has not received the money was privy as a partner (The Huntcliff (1829), 2 Hag. Adm. 281). A bond payable "eight days after my arrival" is good, as it means not the arrival of the master, but his arrival with the ship (Simonds v. Hodgson (1832), 3 B. & Ad. 50). As to the rights of the lender to proceed against the master, see The Jonathan Goodhue (1859), Sw. 524; The Salacia (1862), Lush. 578: The Bark Irma (1873), 2 Asp. M. L. C. 155.

SECT. 5.—Authority to Tranship.

Transhipment.

132. It is the duty of the master to convey the cargo to the place of destination by every reasonable and practical method. When the ship in the course of the voyage has suffered damage, and she cannot be repaired at all, or not without very great loss of time or expense, the master is at liberty to tranship the cargo to another vessel to be forwarded to its original destination (e). He, as agent for the shipowner, is not bound to do this; neither is he under an absolute obligation to the cargo owner to forward the cargo in the original vessel, although, of course, in his capacity of agent to the shipowner, it is his duty to do so if he can (f).

SECT. 6.—Authority to Jettison.

Dangerous goods.

133. Without subjecting himself or the owner of the vessel to any liability, the master may jettison any dangerous goods, or any goods which in his judgment or that of the shipowner are dangerous goods: provided they have been put on board the vessel without their nature being distinctly marked on the outside of the package containing them, and without the master or shipowner having been given a written notice of their nature and of the name and address of the sender or carrier thereof (g).

Jettison to remove danger.

134. In case of imminent danger to the ship or the lives on board of her, the master may jettison such amount of cargo as will be necessary to remove the danger. In extreme cases he may jettison the whole of the cargo. When doing this he may select what articles he pleases, and may determine what quantity (h).

If the master jettisons more cargo than is necessary to remedy the danger to the ship, the shipowner is liable to make good the full value to the cargo owner, and the shipowner is similarly liable when cargo has been rightly jettisoned in case of necessity, but at a time when there has been a deviation from the stipulated voyage (i).

SECT. 6. Authority to Jettison.

SECT. 7.—Authority to Sell Ship or Cargo.

To sell ship.

135. The master has, by virtue of his employment, not merely those powers which are necessary for the navigation of the ship and the conduct of the adventure to a safe termination, but also a power in case of extreme necessity, as when such termination becomes hopeless, and no prospect remains of bringing the vessel home, to do the best for all concerned, and therefore to sell the ship for their benefit (b). Before resorting to a sale he is bound, if money is what is required to enable the voyage to be completed, seriously and deliberately to try every other expedient to raise the necessary funds (c).

Meaning of "necessity."

136. It is impossible to give an exact and concise definition of what constitutes "necessity." It is not sufficient that the sale was bonâ fide and for the benefit of all concerned, or that a prudent owner uninsured would have sold the ship, unless it is also shown that there was urgent necessity for the sale being resorted to (d). In combination with other circumstances some of the ingredients of necessity may be want of repairs and the degree of want, the possibility of procuring repairs at the port where the ship lies, the expense of repairs (e), the expense of remaining in port, the want of funds or credit (f), the impracticability of communicating with the owner, the state and condition of the vessel, and the consequences of not proceeding to sell (g). The burden of proof that the sale was necessary lies on the person seeking to support the sale, on the purchaser as against the owner (h), and on the owner as against the underwriters (i).

Foreign judgment.

137. A judgment in rem of a foreign court having jurisdiction in the matter ordering the sale of the ship is binding even though all the facts were not before it, provided it was not obtained by fraud (k); but if in a foreign country the master, for the purpose of evading the effect of the restrictions on his powers of sale, either fraudulently procures the condemnation and sale of the ship as unfit for sea from some court or judge having jurisdiction in maritime matters, or without fraud procures such condemnation from a court or judge not having jurisdiction, or from an official, or upon the survey and report of surveyors, captains and carpenters, these findings are not binding in the English courts, and the question of the necessity for sale may be inquired into and the sale declared void (l).

Disputing the sale.

138. A master who is compelled to sell may receive the proceeds and give a good discharge (m). If his owner wishes to impeach the sale he must act promptly (n). If he receives the purchase-money knowing the circumstances under which the vessel was sold, and intends to appropriate the money to his own use, he is estopped from disputing the sale (o).

Sale of cargo.

139. A sale of cargo by the master is a matter which requires the utmost caution on his part, for the cargo has been entrusted to him for the express purpose of being carried to its destination (p). When it becomes necessary to provide funds to enable the ship to reach her destination, and this can only be done by hypothecation of the cargo or a sale of a part thereof, a sale is allowed, but it must be limited to a part of the cargo, for a sale of the whole would defeat the very purpose for which the master has been entrusted with the cargo, and this purpose he is bound to accomplish by every reasonable and practicable method (q).

When cargo is improperly sold by the master, the cargo owner may sue the master or shipowner (r) or both (s), or he may recover

Part V.—General Statutory Provisions for Safety of Ship and Cargo.

SECT. 1.—Seaworthiness of Ship.

140. Any person who sends or attempts to send, or the master if he knowingly takes (b), a British ship to sea in such an unseaworthy state (c) that the life of any person is likely to be thereby endangered is, unless he can justify his action, guilty of a misdemeanour (d). The owner's liability for unseaworthiness to a charterer or shipper of goods may sometimes be modified by contract (e).

Sending unseaworthy ships to sea.

141. British sea-going steamships, if employed to carry passengers, must have their compasses properly adjusted to the satisfaction of the shipwright surveyor of the Board of Trade (f), and every emigrant ship must be provided with at least three steering compasses and one azimuth compass (g).

C. 231 (material of ventilators); The Diamond, [1906] P. 282). A vessel was held to be unseaworthy for the voyage by reason of a list caused through the cargo shifting owing to its being improperly stowed (Cunningham v. Frontier Steam Ship Co., [1906] 2 I. R. 12, C. A.). In an unreported case of Tate v. Crosby, Magee & Co. (1898), tried before Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., the defective stowage of a deck cargo of timber was held to render a ship unseaworthy. SECT. 2. Equipment.

Fire hose.

142. Every British sea-going steamship not used wholly as a tug must be provided with a sufficient fire hose capable of being connected with the engines of the ship and used in any part of the ship (h). Every emigrant ship must have a fire engine in proper working order of such description and power, with such other apparatus, if any, as the emigration officer requires (i).

Life-saving appliances.

143. Owners and masters of British ships must see that their ships are provided with proper life-saving appliances in accordance with rules made by the Board of Trade (k), and such appliances must, if lost or rendered unfit for service, be replaced or repaired as soon as possible, and must be at all times fit and ready for use (l). Ships may be inspected by surveyors for the purpose of seeing that they are properly provided with these appliances (m); and masters must keep a record as to boat drill and examination of life-saving appliances (n).

Foreign ships.

Foreign ships engaged in the emigrant trade must carry four properly fitted lifebuoys ready for immediate use (o), and foreign ships, with certain exceptions, are subject to the same regulations on this point as British ships while they are within any port of the United Kingdom (p).

Fishing boats.

Fishing boats do not come within the foregoing provisions, but must be properly provided with boats and lifebuoys (q).

SECT. 3.—Marking of Ships.

Deck lines.

144. In addition to the mark required on registration (r), before a British ship can proceed to sea, the position of each deck which is above water must be permanently marked upon the sides of the ship vessels, other than sea-going passenger steamers and emigrant ships, to be provided with compasses; but where a question as to seaworthiness arises, any sea-going ship not so provided might be held as a fact to be unseaworthy. Rev., Merchant Shipping, Vol. VIII., pp. 201 et seq.). In the case of a steamer not certified to carry passengers and employed solely in the coasting trade, it was held that the master ought to have had a lifebelt for each person on board (Genochio v. Steward (1909), 100 L. R. & O., 1909, p. 581); Norway, 10th August, 1909 (ibid., p. 582); France, 22nd November, 1909 (ibid., p. 580); Sweden, 22nd November, 1909 (ibid., p. 583); Denmark, 22nd April, 1910 (Stat. On the 20th January, 1914, plenipotentiaries from the British Empire (Australia, Canada and New Zealand being separately represented), Germany, France, the United States, Austria-Hungary, Italy, Spain, Norway, Sweden, Holland, Belgium, and Denmark signed a convention as to the measures to be taken in the interests of the safety of maritime passenger traffic, to which effect is to be given by legislative action by the respective countries.

with deck lines of not less than twelve inches in length and one inch in breadth (s).

Load lines, showing the maximum depth to which the ship may be submerged when loaded with cargo, must also be marked on the sides of all British vessels (t), except sailing ships under eighty tons employed solely in the coasting trade (u), fishing boats (a), and pleasure yachts (a), and on certain foreign vessels (b), by a circular disc twelve inches in diameter, with a horizontal line eighteen inches in length drawn through its centre (c). Load lines.

SECT. 4.—Carriage of Dangerous Goods.

145. The sending or carriage by any person other than the master or owner, or the attempt to send or carry, dangerous goods in any vessel, British or foreign, without distinctly marking their nature on the outside of the package, is an offence (d). Carriage of dangerous goods.

Masters and owners may refuse to ship any packages which they suspect to contain dangerous goods, and if they find such goods on board not marked and declared, may cause them to be thrown overboard (e); and a court having Admiralty jurisdiction may declare such goods forfeited (f). The carriage of explosives within the meaning of the Explosives Act, 1875 (g), or any vitriol or lucifer matches, is forbidden in the case of emigrant ships (h).

SECT. 5.—Deck Cargoes.

146. The term "deck cargo" means any cargo carried either in any uncovered space upon deck, or in any covered space not included in the cubical contents forming the ship's registered tonnage (i). When any such space is occupied by cargo it has to be added to the Deck cargo.

See, also, Orders of the Board of Trade of the 24th April, 1907, and the 30th May, 1907 (tugs, salvage-steamers etc. are exempted). By dangerous goods are here meant aquafortis, vitriol, naphtha, benzine, gunpowder, lucifer matches, nitro-glycerine, petroleum, any explosives within the meaning of the Explosives Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 17), and any other goods which are of a dangerous nature (M. registered tonnage of the ship for the purpose of ascertaining the tonnage dues payable (j). The ordinary regulations with regard to deck cargo do not apply in the case of ships trading exclusively in any river or inland water in a British possession, or engaged in the coasting trade of any British possession (k).

In the case of emigrant ships no cargo, luggage, or stores may be carried on the upper deck or passenger decks until the approval of the emigration officer at the port of clearance has been obtained (l).

Wood goods.

147. If any ship arrives between the last day of October and the 16th April at any port of the United Kingdom from any port abroad, carrying either heavy or light wood goods as deck cargo, except under conditions allowed by statute, the master of the ship, and the owner, if privy to the offence, are liable to a fine, unless such goods have been placed on deck during the voyage by reason of any damage to the ship, or the vessel sailed on such a date that in the ordinary course of events she would have arrived at her port outside the prohibited period (m); but a vessel not bound to a port in the United Kingdom coming into a port of the United Kingdom for any purpose other than delivery of her cargo is not subject to the foregoing provisions (n).

SECT. 6.—Stowage of Grain Cargo.

Stowage of grain.

148. When a British ship is laden with a grain cargo (o), or a foreign ship so laden arrives or loads at a port in the United Kingdom (p), all necessary and reasonable precautions against the shifting of the grain must have been taken (q).

The master of the ship must deliver to the British consular officer (j) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 85. The word "cargo" is not confined to its ordinary sense. Space on deck occupied by coal for use in ship's boilers fires must be added to ship's registered tonnage for purpose of light dues (Cairn Line of Steamships, Ltd. v. Trinity House Corporation, [1908] 1 K. B. 528, C. A.; see also Richmond Hill Steamship Co. v. Trinity House Corporation, [1896] 2 Q. B. 134, C. A. (horses and cattle)).

This provision sets out the conditions under which such wood goods may be carried as deck cargo, and Board of Trade Rules (1907, No. 78), of the 7th February, 1907, regulate (1) classes of ships approved for the purpose of carrying heavy wood goods as deck cargo, (2) regulations with respect to the loading of heavy wood goods as deck cargo, and (3) regulations for the protection of seamen from risk arising from the carriage of wood goods as deck cargo in uncovered spaces on board ship. (q) If proper precautions have not been taken, the master, and in the case of a British ship the agent of the owner charged with the loading, is liable to a fine not exceeding £300 (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 452, and M. S. Act, 1906, s. 3), or not exceeding £100 if prosecuted summarily under the M. S. Act, 1906, s. 11, unless he proves that he took all reasonable precautions against, and was not privy to the offence. The M. S. Act, 1894, Sched. XVIII., and Regulations of the Board of Trade, which may be obtained from the King's printers, lay down rules on the proper stowage mainly directed against the stowage of such cargo in bulk. As to stowage, see, further, pp. 203 et seq., post.

at the port of loading, and to the proper officer of customs in the United Kingdom, a notice stating the ship's draught and clear side, the kind and quantity of the grain, the mode of stowage, and the precautions taken against shifting (r).

SECT. 6. Stowage of Grain Cargo.

SECT. 7.—Detention of Unsafe Ships.

149. The Board of Trade has power to detain in any port in the United Kindom a ship which is unsafe by reason of the defective condition of her hull, equipments or machinery, or by reason of overloading or improper loading (s), or by reason of undermanning (t). Provision is made for examination by a surveyor and appeal to a court of survey (u) for the port or district.

Power to detain unsafe ships.

If the detention of the ship was without reasonable and probable cause, the Board of Trade may be liable to pay costs and compensation (v).

Part VI.—Conduct of the Voyage.

SECT. 1.—Clearances.

150. A ship cannot lawfully proceed to sea without the necessary clearances, or permission to sail, from the officers of the customs or others appointed for that purpose (w).

Clearances.

A clearance may not be granted for any ship until the master has declared the name of the nation to which he claims that she belongs (x), and may be refused where, under the Merchant Shipping Acts (a), an officer of the customs has power to detain the ship (b).

151. No emigrant ship can clear outwards or proceed to sea until the master has obtained from the emigration officer at the port of clearance a certificate for clearance showing that the statutory requirements for such class of ships have been duly complied with, and that the ship, steerage passengers, and crew are in a fit state to proceed (c); if she proceeds to sea or attempts to do so without having obtained the proper certificates for clearance, she may be seized and forfeited to the Crown (d). If the emigration officer refuses to grant such certificate an appeal lies to the Board of Trade. An appeal is also allowed to a court of survey (e).

An emigrant ship which, after clearance, puts into or touches at any port in the British Islands, may not proceed to sea again until the master has obtained from the emigration officer a certificate for clearance to the same effect as that given her at her port of departure (f).

SECT. 2.—Official Logs.

The official log.

152. Every ship, unless employed exclusively in trading between ports on the coasts of Scotland, must carry an official log in the appropriate form for such ship approved by the Board of Trade, containing proper spaces for the entries required by the Merchant Shipping Acts (g); the official log may be kept distinct from, or united with, the ordinary ship's log. All entries in the log-book must be made as soon as possible after the occurrences to which they relate, and must be signed by the master, and by the mate or some other member of the crew, and in certain special cases by other specified persons (h). Every entry so made is admissible in evidence (i).

What must be entered.

153. The master is bound to enter in the official log-book every conviction of a member of his crew by a legal tribunal, and every offence by a member of his crew which it is intended to take steps to punish or for which a punishment is inflicted on board; a statement of the conduct, character, and qualifications of each of his crew, or a statement that he declines to give an opinion of those particulars; every case of illness or injury happening to a member of the crew; every marriage taking place on board; the name of every seaman or apprentice who ceases to be a member of the crew otherwise than by death, with the place, time, manner, and cause thereof; the wages due to any seaman who enters the Royal Navy during the voyage; entries with regard to wages due to any seaman or apprentice who dies during the voyage and the sale of his effects; every collision with any other ship; and any other matter directed by the Merchant Shipping Acts (g) to be entered (k).

(g) See note (a), p. 10, ante.

(h) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 239. The master is liable to a fine not exceeding £5 for neglect in making the proper entries. Should he or anyone make an entry in the official log-book more than twenty-four hours after the arrival of the ship at her final port of discharge in respect of any occurrence happening previous to the arrival, liability to a fine not exceeding £30 is incurred. Any person wilfully destroying or mutilating or rendering illegible any entry in the official log-book or wilfully making any false entry in or omission from it, is guilty of a misdemeanour (ibid., s. 241).

(i) Ibid., s. 239 (6); see title EVIDENCE, Vol. XIII., pp. 462, 541, 542. As to making an entry in the engineer's log evidence against the owner although not entered in the official log, see The Earl of Dumfries (1885), 10 P. D. 31.

(k) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 240. As to the entry of statutory offences, see p. 63, ante.

154. The official log-book must be delivered up to the mercantile marine superintendent, in the case of foreign-going ships within forty-eight hours of arrival at the final port of destination in the United Kingdom or upon the discharge of the crew, whichever first happens, and in the case of home-trade ships twice in every year (l). It must be sent to the superintendent at the port to which the ship belonged when it ceases to be required in respect of the ship by reason of transfer of ownership or change of employment, and also, if practicable, when a ship is lost or abandoned (m). Delivery of log-book.

SECT. 3.—Compliance with Warranties.

155. A passenger has a right of action at common law for unreasonable delay in the time of sailing (n). It is understood in all contracts by charterparty that there shall be no such unreasonable delay (o); and if in a policy of insurance the ship is warranted to sail before or after a given day, the underwriter is discharged if the warranty is not strictly fulfilled (p). Delay.

In all charterparties there is an implied stipulation against deviation (q), but stress of weather, occasion for repairs, or other necessity may justify it (r). Deviation.

In time of war, if there is an undertaking to sail with convoy, that is to say, under the protection of war vessels expressly appointed for that purpose, the ship must be put under such protection (s). Convoy.

SECT. 4. Protests.

SECT. 4.—Protests.

Protests.

156. A protest is a declaration by the master as to the incidents of the voyage, storms or bad weather or accident, which may have compelled him to put in at some intermediate port. It is made before a notary or British consul, and may be important for the purpose of stating the damage which has taken place, for the sake of supporting a claim against the underwriters, since although the claim would not otherwise be barred, yet unless stated in protest suspicion might arise that the damage did not occur (t).

Protests are receivable as evidence in many foreign courts, but not in English courts (a).

Part VII.—Carriage of Goods.

SUB-SECT. 1.—General Nature of the Contract.

Definition.

157. A contract by charterparty (b) is a contract by which an entire ship or some principal part thereof is let to a merchant, who is called the charterer, for the conveyance of goods on a determined voyage to one or more places (c), or until the expiration of a specified period (d). Such a contract may operate as a demise of the ship

(b) The word is derived from charta partita (Abbott on Shipping, 5th ed., p. 163; 14th ed., p. 330). Sometimes a form of contract is used by ship's brokers known as a "berth note," by which the broker notifies the shipowner that his ship has been engaged to carry a specified cargo: such a contract has been held to impose on the broker a personal liability (Hick v. Tweedy & Co. (1890), 63 L. T. 765; Steamship Rotherfield Co., Ltd. v. Tweedy, Reid & Co. (1897), 2 Com. Cas. 84; The Dawlish, [1910] P. 339; compare Simpson v. Young (1861), 2 F. & F. 426). As to bills of lading, see pp. 144 et seq., post. It is not necessary that a contract for the employment of a ship upon a voyage should be in writing (Lidgett v. Williams (1845), 4 Hare, 456, 462). As to forwarding agents, see Sutton & Co. v. Ciceri & Co. (1890), 15 App. Cas. 144; Heugh v. Escombe (1861), 4 L. T. 517. For forms of charterparties, see Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. XIV., pp. 92 et seq.

(c) Abbott on Shipping, 5th ed., p. 162; 14th ed., p. 328.

(d) Specific performance of a charterparty will not be ordered, but an injunction may be granted to restrain the parties, including a purchaser (Messageries Imperiales Co. v. Baines (1863), 7 L. T. 763), or mortgagee (De Mattos v. Gibson (1859), 4 De G. & J. 276, C. A.) of the ship from employing the ship in a manner inconsistent with the charterparty (Sevin v. Deslandes (1860), 7 Jur. (N. S.) 837; Kern v. Deslandes (1861), 10 C. B. (N. S.) 205; Le Blanch v. Granger (1866), 35 Beav. 187; Heriot v. Nicholas (1864), 12 W. R. 844); see titles INJUNCTION, Vol. XVII., p. 247; SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE, Vol. XXVII., pp. 8, 9. For cases in which an injunction has been refused, see De Mattos v. Gibson, supra, where it was not proved that the mortgagee had interfered; Adamson v. Gill (1868), 18 L. T. 278, where the cargo was rendered by an excepted peril unfit to be carried. A charterparty which impairs the mortgagee's security is not itself, to which the services of the master and crew may or may not be superadded, or it may confer on the charterer nothing more than the right to have his goods conveyed by a particular ship, and, as subsidiary thereto, to have the use of the ship and the services of the master and crew (e).

Charterparty by demise.

158. A charterparty by way of demise is of two kinds, namely, (1) locatio navis, where the hull is the subject-matter of the charterparty (f), and (2) locatio navis et operarum magistri et nauticorum, under which the ship passes to the charterer in a state fit for the purposes of mercantile adventure (g). In both cases the charterer becomes for the time being the owner of the ship (h); the master and crew are, or become to all intents and purposes, his servants, and through them the possession of the ship is in him (i). The owner, on the other hand, has divested himself of all control either over the ship or over the master and crew (k). His sole right is to receive the stipulated hire, and to take back the ship when the charterparty comes to an end (l). During the currency of the charterparty, therefore, he is under no liability to third persons whose goods may have been conveyed upon the demised ship (m), or who may have done work or supplied stores for the ship (n), and binding upon him after he takes possession (Law Guarantee and Trust Society v. Russian Bank for Foreign Trade, [1905] 1 K. B. 815, C. A., where the ships had been chartered by the mortgagors to carry contraband of war, and were not insured against war risks, such an insurance being in the circumstances of the case a commercial impossibility).

A., per VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., at p. 689).

(i) Belcher v. Capper (1842), 4 Man. & G. 502 (where the charterer appointed the master, being allowed by the shipowners the amount paid to his own master). The fact that the charterer pays the wages of the master and crew is not in itself sufficient (Fenton v. City of Dublin Steam Packet Co. (1838), 8 Ad. & El. 835).

(k) Meiklereid v. West, supra; Baumwoll Manufactur von Carl Scheibler v. Furness, supra. Sometimes the shipowner retains in his hands the appointment and control of his chief engineer; see Baumwoll Manufactur von Carl Scheibler v. Furness, supra.

(l) Meiklereid v. West, supra. He has therefore no lien on the cargo for the hire (Hutton v. Bragg (1816), 7 Taunt. 14; Belcher v. Capper, supra), nor is he liable as owner for light dues (Trinity House (Master, etc.) v. Clark, supra).

(m) Baumwoll Manufactur von Carl Scheibler v. Furness, supra. But the shipowner may render himself liable by delivering the cargo to the wrong person (Schuster v. McKellar, supra). As to his liability on the bill of lading, see p. 168, post.

SECT. 1. Charterparties.

such persons must look only to the charterer who has taken his place (o).

Charterparty which is not a demise.

159. A charterparty which does not operate as a demise may be classified as a locatio operis vehendarum mercium (p). Though it confers on the charterer the temporary right to have his goods loaded and conveyed in the ship, the ownership remains in the original owner, and, through the master and crew, who continue to be his servants, the possession of the ship also (q). The existence of the charterparty, therefore, does not necessarily divest the owner of liability to third persons whose goods may have been conveyed on the ship (r), nor does it deprive him of his rights as owner (s).

Test whether charterparty operates as demise.

160. Whether a charterparty operates as a demise or not is a question of construction, to be determined by reference to the language of the particular charterparty (t). The principal test to be applied is whether the master is the servant of the owner or of the charterer (a). Even where the charterparty provides for the nomination of the master by the charterer, he must be regarded as the servant of the owner, if the effect of the charterparty is that he is to be paid or dismissed by the owner, and that he is to be subject to the owner's orders as to navigation (b). On the other hand, if the charterparty is otherwise to be regarded as a demise, it is immaterial that the owner reserves the right, in certain circumstances, of removing the master and appointing another in his place (c), or of appointing the chief engineer (d).

Rights of charterers to carry goods of third persons.

161. Under a charterparty by way of demise the charterer may, unless prohibited by its terms, employ the ship in carrying either his own goods or those of others, and he may also sub-charter her (e). Where, however, the charterparty does not operate as a demise, the extent of the charterer's right to require the ship to carry goods belonging to third persons depends upon the terms of his contract. The contract of carriage is personal to himself, and

(r) It is therefore immaterial that the shipowner is ignorant of the charterparty, if it is in fact covered by the master's authority (Steel v. Lester (1877), 3 C. P. D. 121).

(s) Lucas v. Nockells (1833), 1 Cl. & Fin. 438, H. L.; Dean v. Hogg (1834), 10 Bing. 345.

(t) Sandeman v. Scurr, supra, per COCKBURN, C.J., at p. 96. The charterparty may be a demise, though no express words of demise are used (Colvin v. Newberry and Benson (1832), 1 Cl. & Fin. 283, H. L.); on the other hand, the use of words of demise does not necessarily take the ship out of the shipowner's possession (Christie v. Lewis (1821), 2 Brod. & Bing. 410).

he cannot call upon the shipowner to undertake liabilities to third persons or transfer to third persons his own liabilities to the shipowner unless the contract so provides (f). In the absence of any such provision, the charterer is not entitled to ship goods other than his own, except upon the terms that the bill of lading is made out to himself (g).

It is not unusual, however, when the charterer intends to make his profit by carrying the goods of third persons, for the charterparty to contain a stipulation that the master may be required to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight without prejudice to the charterparty (h). Under such a stipulation the charterer is entitled to use the ship as a general ship, and the shipowner may, by reason of the master's signing bills of lading, become liable in certain circumstances to third persons if the goods are lost or damaged (i); in this case he is entitled to be indemnified by the charterer, to the extent that his liability is greater than that imposed by the charterparty (k).

Stamp duty.

162. A charterparty, which includes any agreement or contract for the charter of any ship or vessel, or any memorandum, letter, or other writing, between the captain, master, or owner of any ship or vessel and any other person, for or relating to the freight or conveyance of any money, goods, or effects on board his ship or vessel (l), but not a mere collateral agreement, such as a guarantee that the charterer will fulfil the terms of the charterparty (m), must be stamped with a 6*d.* stamp (n). The duty may be denoted by an adhesive stamp, which is to be cancelled by the person by whom the charterparty is last executed, or by whose execution it is completed as a binding contract (o). If it is first executed out of the United Kingdom without being duly stamped, it may be stamped with an adhesive stamp by any party thereto within ten days after it has first been received in the United Kingdom, and before it has been executed by any person in the United Kingdom (p). A charterparty may, after execution, be stamped with an impressed stamp on the following terms, namely: (1) within seven days after the first execution thereof, on payment of the duty and a penalty of 4*s*. 6*d*.; (2) after seven days, but within one month after the first execution thereof, on payment of the duty and a penalty of £10. In no other cases may a charterparty be stamped with an impressed stamp (q).

SUB-SECT. 2.—The Parties.

Contracts by agents.

163. The natural parties to a charterparty are the shipowner and the charterer, and where the charterparty is executed by both no difficulty arises (a). In practice, however, the contract is frequently made, on behalf of the owner, by the master (b), managing owner, or other agent, and, on behalf of the charterer, by a shipbroker or correspondent (c). A question then arises as to the respective rights and liabilities under the contract of the several principals and agents.

Charter-parties under seal.

164. Where the charterparty is under seal, the rules applicable

(p) Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 50. This provision does not apply where the charterparty is wholly executed abroad (The Belfort (1884), 9 P. D. 215); see the text, infra.

(q) Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 51. In The Belfort, supra, a charterparty wholly executed abroad, and stamped within two months after it was received in this country, was received in evidence under the now repealed Stamp Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97), s. 15 (2). In the corresponding provision of the Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 15 (3), thirty days is substituted for two months. In both Acts the provision applies to "any unstamped or insufficiently stamped instrument . . . first executed . . . out of the United Kingdom."

(b) The master may have express authority to charter the ship (Messageries Imperiales Co. v. Baines (1863), 7 L. T. 763); his implied authority arises only when he is in a foreign port and communication with the shipowner is difficult (The Fanny, The Mathilda (1883), 48 L. T. 771, C. A.); compare The Sir Henry Webb (1849), 13 Jur. 639; and see pp. 64, 65, ante.

(c) An authority to an agent to procure a charterparty does not necessarily include an authority to cancel it when procured (Thomas v. Lewis (1878), 4 Ex. D. 18; Raeburn and Verel v. Burness & Sons (1895), 1 Com. Cas. 22). Nor may an agent, whether of the shipowner (Burgon v. Sharpe (1810), 2 Camp. 529; Pearson v. Göschen (1864), 17 C. B. (N. S.) 352 (where the extent of the master's authority was discussed); Reynolds v. Jex (1865), 7 B. & S. 86; Capper v. Wallace (1880), 5 Q. B. D. 163; The Canada (1897), 13 T. L. R. 238), or of the charterer (Sickens v. Irving (1859), 7 C. B. (N. S.) 165; Lindsay & Son v. Scholefield (1897), 24 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 530), vary the terms of the charterparty after completion, unless he to deeds govern the rights and liabilities of the parties (d). An agent, therefore, cannot bind his principal, unless he is empowered to do so by a power of attorney (e), and the charterparty must be made and executed in the name of the principal (f). If the agent executes the charterparty in his own name he binds himself, but not his principal (g), and cannot escape liability by proving that he acted only as agent (h). On the other hand, his principal cannot enforce the stipulations of the charterparty (i).

Charter-parties not under seal.

165. Where, on the other hand, the charterparty is not under seal, the ordinary rules of agency apply (k). The principal may, therefore, be sued upon the contract of his agent, whether he was known at the time when the contract was made or not, or whether it was or was not known that there was a principal at all (l). The agent also may be sued if there is a custom making him personally liable on the charterparty (m), or if he has chosen to make himself a contracting party (n). He may be treated as a contracting

(g) Abbott on Shipping, 5th ed., p. 164; 14th ed., p. 333; Hunter v. Prinsep (1808), 10 East, 378. But the principal may be sued for a breach of an implied obligation not inconsistent with the stipulations of the charterparty (Leslie v. Wilson (1821), 3 Brod. & Bing. 171).

(k) See title AGENCY, Vol. I., pp. 201 et seq. Hence the principal may be liable when he has held out the agent as having authority to enter into a charterparty (Smith v. M'Guire (1858), 3 H. & N. 554; compare The Fanny, The Mathilda (1883), 48 L. An agent contracting on behalf of the Crown is not personally liable, unless the form of the charterparty has that effect (Cunningham v. Collier (1785), 4 Doug. (K. B.) 233). The liability of the shipowner and his agent is an alternative one, and a judgment against the agent is a bar to proceedings against the principal (Priestly v. Fernie (1865), 3 H. & C. 977; and compare Meier & Co. v. Küchenmeister (1881), 8 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 642, where an unsuccessful action against the agent was held not to be a bar). A broker may bind himself to procure a charter so as to render himself party wherever he has signed the charterparty in his own name (o), unless it is clear, either from the terms of the charterparty (p) or otherwise (q), that his personal liability was intended to be excluded (r). When the agent is personally liable on the contract, he is equally entitled to enforce it (s).

Principal unnamed or undisclosed.

An agent who enters into a charterparty as agent on behalf of an unnamed principal may declare himself the principal, and may enforce the charterparty on his own behalf (t). On the other hand, a principal whose existence is undisclosed cannot intervene and sue upon the charterparty (a), if the agent has expressly contracted as a principal, since to allow the principal to do so would be to contradict the language of the charterparty (b).

Unauthorised charter-parties.

An agent who contracts as such and has no authority to bind his principal is liable for breach of warranty of authority (c), though he cannot, as being an agent, be sued upon the charterparty (d). The principal may, however, ratify the charterparty (e), provided that the agent purported to make it on his behalf; a person who was not the principal within the contemplation of the agent cannot ratify it (f).

SUB-SECT. 3.—Usual Stipulations.

(i.) As to the Ship.

Description of ship.

166. In every charterparty the name of the ship which is to be chartered is specified, and her description given in detail (g). The description usually includes stipulations as to the nature of the ship, her registered tonnage (h), her classification at Lloyd's (i), her position at the date of the charterparty, and her fitness for the purposes of the charterer; it may, in addition, specify her carrying capacity and the name of her master (k).

How far stipulations are conditions.

Of these stipulations, those relating to the name (l) and nature (m) of the ship, to her position at the date of the charterparty (n), and to her carrying capacity (o) are to be regarded as conditions precedent (p) on the non-fulfilment of which the charterer may

(i) As to the effect of a statement as to class, see the text, infra.

(l) The nationality of the ship, if stated in the charterparty, may be a condition precedent in time of war (Behn v. Burness (1863), 3 B. & S. 751, Ex. Ch., per WILLIAMS, J., at p. 757; compare title INSURANCE, Vol. XVII., pp. 362, 418, 420). T. 524; compare Ollive v. Booker (1847), 1 Exch. 416, where the ship was described as "now at sea, having sailed three weeks ago," whereas she had only sailed a week previously. Ch.; Oliver v. Fielden (1849), 4 Exch. 135), are equally conditions precedent. Where the stipulation is treated as a warranty, the damages may include any additional insurance premiums incurred (Engman v. Palgrave, Brown & Son (1898), 4 Com. Cas. 75).

(o) Carnegie v. Conner (1889), 24 Q. B. D. 45; Jardine, Matheson & Co. v. Clyde Shipping Co., [1910] 1 K. B. 627; compare Hassan v. Runciman & Co. (1904), 10 Com. Cas. 19; Societa Anonyma Ungherese v. Tyser Line, Ltd. (1902), 8 Com. Cas. 25, where the shipowner expressly guaranteed the capacity; and p. 103, post. This stipulation must be construed with reference to the surrounding circumstances (The "Norway" (Owners) v. Ashburner, The "Norway" (1865), 3 Moo. P. C. C. (N. S.) 245; Mackill v. Wright Brothers & Co. (1888), 14 App. Cas. 106), and bunker space is not to be included (The Resolven (1892), 9 T. L. R. 75). If the ship is loaded and proceeds on her voyage with such cargo as she can carry, the stipulation must be treated as a warranty and not as a condition precedent (Pust v. Dowie (1864), 5 B. & S. 20).

(p) See p. 142, post. Where a representation is made which is not embodied in the charterparty, it may nevertheless be treated as a collateral repudiate the contract. The stipulation as to the classification of the ship amounts to a condition precedent that she is classed as described at the date of the charterparty (q). The charterer may, therefore, if the condition is broken, refuse to accept the ship (r); if he accepts her, he is nevertheless entitled to recover from the shipowner any damages which he may have sustained by reason of the misdescription, such as, for instance, increased premiums for insurance (s). The shipowner does not, however, by such stipulation undertake that his ship is entitled to her class as described (t), or that she will continue to retain it (a). The stipulation as to fitness must be distinguished from the implied condition that the ship is to be fit at the port of loading to carry the cargo (b); it refers only to the date of the charterparty (c), and is not to be regarded as a condition precedent (d) unless its breach wholly frustrates the object of the voyage (e). The stipulation as to the name of the master is not a condition (f); nor is that relating to the registered tonnage (g), unless the shipowner is guilty of fraud (h), or unless the difference amounts to a material misdescription (i).

(ii.) As to the Voyage or Time.

Voyage charter.

167. A voyage charter must necessarily define the termini of the voyage which the ship is chartered to perform. It must therefore specify the port of loading and the port of discharge (k); and in some cases the specification may include the dock or wharf at which the loading or unloading, as the case may be, is to take place (l). It is not, however, necessary that such ports should be named; the charterer may be empowered to order the ship to verbal warranty, and damages may be awarded for its breach (Hassan v. Runciman & Co. (1904), 10 Com. Cas. 19).

proceed to any port within certain limits specified in the charter-party (m).

Proceeding to port of loading.

168. It is usually stipulated that the ship shall with all possible despatch (n) proceed to the port of loading (o). This stipulation is not a condition precedent (p); hence, if the ship is unduly delayed on her voyage to the port of loading (q), or even if she deviates from the proper course of her voyage on her way to that port (r), the charterer is not necessarily discharged from his obligation to provide a cargo, though, in the absence of any exception excusing the delay (s) he is entitled to recover damages, inasmuch as there is a breach of contract on the part of the shipowner (t). Nevertheless, it is an implied condition of the contract that the ship shall arrive at her port of loading in time for the contemplated voyage (a). If, therefore, the effect of the delay (b) or deviation (c) is, in a commercial sense, to put an end to the commercial speculation entered into by the shipowner and the charterer, the charterer is discharged from his contract, and may, unless the shipowner is excused by the terms of the charterparty (d), sue for damages (e). SECT. 1. Charter-parties.

charterparty contains a stipulation that the ship is to sail (f) for the port of loading, or to arrive there (g) by a named day, such stipulation is to be construed as a condition (h), and the shipowner is not excused for non-performance of the condition, even where attributable to an excepted peril (i). Moreover, where the stipulation provides that the ship is to arrive at the port of loading by a named day, otherwise the charterer to be discharged from his obligation to load (k), the shipowner must nevertheless use all reasonable despatch, and is liable in damages in case of deviation or delay, even though the ship in fact reaches the port of loading before the expiration of the time allowed (l).

The voyage.

169. After loading her cargo (m) the ship is usually required by an express stipulation to proceed with all possible despatch (n) to the port of discharge (o). This stipulation is a condition, the breach of which entitles the charterer to treat the charterparty (p) as at an end (q). The shipowner is no longer protected by any exception contained in the charterparty, but stands in the position of an insurer (r). In the event, therefore, of the cargo sustaining any loss or damage after the breach, he must accept all responsibility (s), (f) As to the meaning of "sail," see pp. 219, 220, post. Sometimes the charterparty may impose a penalty if the ship fails to sail by a given date; see Sharp v. Gibbs (1857), 1 H. & N. 801; Sparrow v. Paris (1862), 7 H. & N. 594.

and it is immaterial whether the loss or damage is attributable to the breach or not (t).

Deviation.

170. In the performance of this condition, apart from any special stipulation in the charterparty, the ship must without unreasonable delay start upon her voyage (a), and proceed from the port of loading to the port of discharge by the ordinary sea route between such ports (b). Any departure from such route is a deviation which in the absence of some lawful excuse is a breach of the condition (c). The ship, therefore, is not at liberty to call at any intermediate ports except where it is customary on the particular voyage to do so (d); nor may she turn aside to tow a vessel in distress (e), or to salve property which is in danger of being lost by perils of the sea (f). Deviation is, however, excused, and no breach of the condition is committed, in the following cases, namely:—

Deviation to save life.

(1) Where it is for the purpose of saving life (g). The ship, therefore, may lawfully deviate for the purpose of communicating with a ship in distress, since danger to life may be involved (h). If the lives on board the ship in distress can be saved without saving the ship, as by taking them off, any attempt to save the ship will render the deviation a breach of the contract (i). If, however, the preservation of life can only be effected through the concurrent saving of property, and the bonâ fide purpose of saving life forms part of the motive which leads to the deviation, the privilege will not be lost by reason of the purpose of saving property having formed a second motive for deviating (k).

Deviation through stress of weather, or to avoid danger.

(2) Where the ship is driven out of her course by a storm, or where she is attempting to avoid imminent danger (l), such as, for instance, capture, whether by the enemies of the country to which the ship belongs (m), or by pirates (n), or ice (o). She may, therefore, resort to a port of refuge, either for the purpose of sheltering from the storm or repairing any damage sustained (p), or for the purpose of avoiding the danger (q), but she must not remain at the port of refuge any longer than necessity requires (r).

Express stipulations as to deviation :

171. The stringency of the condition against deviation is usually modified by an express stipulation in the charterparty (s). Both delay and deviation are thus expressly permitted in certain specified cases, which are usually the following, namely :—

(1) liberty to call ;

(1) The ship is given liberty to call at any ports in any order (t). This stipulation does not confer on the ship liberty to call at any port in the world (a) ; it must be given a reasonable interpretation, and is therefore to be construed as referring to ports which are substantially ports which will be passed on the specified voyage, and which would naturally and usually be ports of call (b). The exercise of this liberty necessarily involves deviation, and it also involves delay, since the ship is entitled not merely to go into the port, but to remain there for some business purpose, such as, for instance, loading or unloading cargo or receiving orders (c).

(2) liberty to tow ;

(2) The ship is given liberty to tow and assist vessels in distress. Under this stipulation the ship may deviate (d), and even return on

R. 5 P. C. 301, 305 ; The Wilhelm Schmidt (1871), 25 L. T. 34). The danger may affect the ship only, not the goods (The "Teutonia" (1872), L. R. 4 P. C. 171). (3) liberty to save property.

172. Though the stipulation as to the ship proceeding to the port of loading is not a condition precedent of the contract, it imposes certain obligations on the shipowner (h). If, therefore, after the date of the charterparty (i) he sends the ship upon any voyage other than that to the port of loading, he is guilty of a breach of contract which entitles the charterer to recover damages (j), and in certain cases to repudiate the contract (k). It is not unusual, however, for the charterparty to contain a special stipulation authorising the shipowner to send the ship upon a preliminary voyage (l). This preliminary voyage is in effect the voyage to the port of loading, the ship having liberty to deviate for the purpose of calling at certain specified ports on the way either to take in or to discharge cargo for the shipowner's benefit (m).

Preliminary voyage.

173. Where the charterparty gives the charterer the option of ordering the ship to various ports of discharge, such ports may not always be situated within the same area. The risks of the voyage and the position of the parties may be materially altered according to the situation of the port to which the ship is actually ordered to proceed. It is, therefore, usual in such a case to specify in the charterparty the conditions under which the option is to be exercised by the charterer (n).

Option to name port of discharge.

174. A charterparty frequently contains a cancellation clause under which the charterer is given the option of cancelling the charterparty if the ship is not ready to load by a specified time (o).

SECT. 1. Charter-parties.

This option is to be exercised when notice is given that the ship is ready to load (p). The clause does not, however, operate in derogation of the charterer's general right to repudiate the contract in case a condition is broken (q). Thus, where the ship has deviated or delayed on her voyage to the port of loading, and the object of the charterer is thereby wholly frustrated, he is entitled to repudiate the contract, notwithstanding that the ship in fact arrives and is placed at his disposal before the time specified (r).

Time charter.

175. A time charter (s) necessarily contains stipulations as to the term during which the charterparty is to be in force. These stipulations are usually to the following effect, namely (t):—

(1) The term is to run from the day on which the ship is placed at the charterer's disposal at a named port. In this case it is a condition precedent that she shall be placed at his disposal within a reasonable time after the making of the charterparty (u).

(2) The term is to run from a specified date. In this case it is a condition precedent that the ship is to be placed at the charterer's disposal on that date (a).

(3) The term is to run, alternatively, from a specified date or from so soon thereafter as the ship has been placed at the charterer's disposal at a named port. Where the stipulation is in this form the charterer cannot be compelled to accept the ship at an earlier date (b), nor can he repudiate the contract on the ground that she is not placed at his disposal on that date, since the shipowner is allowed a reasonable time thereafter within which to perform his contract (c).

Option to continue.

176. The charterer is usually given an option to continue the charterparty for a further term (d); and the shipowner is usually

(p) As to notice of readiness to load, see p. 186, post. The ship is, therefore, bound to proceed to the port of loading, although she cannot arrive in time (Shubrick v. Salmond (1765), 3 Burr. 1637), and the charterer cannot be required to exercise his option sooner (Moel Tryvan (Owners) v. Weir (1909), 15 Com. Cas. 61). The court will not, however, grant an injunction to restrain the shipowner from proceeding elsewhere (Bucknall Brothers v. Tatem & Co. (1900), 83 L. T. 121, C. A., distinguishing De Mattos v. Gibson (1859), 4 De G. & J. 276, C. A., and Sevin v. Deslandes (1860), 7 Jur. (N. S.) 837).

(q) See pp. 142, 143, post. It is immaterial that the delay is caused by an excepted peril (Smith v. Dart & Son (1884), 14 Q. B. D. 105), unless made specially applicable (Granger v. Dent (1829), Mood. & M. 475). Nor does the exercise of the option preclude the charterer from claiming damages for failure to send the ship (Nelson (Thomas) & Sons v. Dundee East Coast Shipping Co., Ltd., [1907] S. C. 927).

given the right of withdrawing the ship from the charterer's service before the expiration of the term if the hire is not duly paid (e). Provision is also usually made for the cesser of hire in certain cases (f).

(iii.) As to the Cargo.

Description of cargo.

177. A charterparty, except where the ship is chartered as a general ship (g), usually contains a description of the cargo which is to be shipped (h). The description may be framed in general terms, as, for instance, where the cargo is described as "wheat," or it may go into details, and thus limit the application of the general words of description, as, for instance, where the cargo is described as "battens," and it is further stated what the dimensions of the battens are to be (i). In either case it is a condition of the contract that the charterer shall ship a cargo in accordance with the description (k). If, therefore, the cargo actually provided by the charterer does not, substantially at any rate, correspond with his description, the shipowner may refuse to accept it when tendered, since it is not the cargo which he contracted to carry (l). If, however, he accepts it in ignorance of its real character, he must be taken, in the absence of fraud, to have contracted to carry what was delivered to him (m), although he is presumably entitled to recover from his charterer any damages which he may have sustained by reason of the Dunford & Co., Ltd. v. Cia Anonima Maritima Union (1911), 16 Com. Cas. 181, not following Pope v. Bavidge (1854), 10 Exch. 73. A stipulation may be made to extend the time where the ship does not complete her voyage at the end of the period for which she is chartered; in this case the charterer is not precluded from sending the ship upon a voyage which must necessarily extend beyond the period (Dene Steam Shipping Co., Ltd. v. Bucknall Brothers (1900), 5 Com. Cas. 372; compare Bucknall Brothers v. Murray (1900), 5 Com. Cas. 312; Re S.S. Istok (Owners) and Drughorn (1902), 7 Com. Cas. 190, C. A.), though such a stipulation is not necessary (Gray & Co. v. Christie & Co. (1889), 5 T. L. R. 577). The charterparty may, however, make the time specified for re-delivery of the essence of the contract (Watson Steamship Co., Ltd. v. Merryweather & Co. (1913), 108 L. T. 1031). The charterer is not responsible for the loss of the vessel, after the expiration of the charterparty, by the act of God (Smith v. Drummond (1883), Cab. & El. 160).

(e) See Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. XIV., pp. 93, 98. It is not necessary to demand payment before withdrawing the ship (Re Tyrer & Co. and Hessler & Co. (1902), 7 Com. Cas. 166, C. A.). The right to withdraw may be lost by accepting payment after it is due (S.S. Langford (Owners) v. Canadian Forwarding and Export Co. (1907), 96 L. T. 559, P. C.), or by permitting the charterer to load the ship (Nova Scotia Steel Co. v. Sutherland Steam Shipping Co. (1899), 5 Com. Cas. 106), but not by the mere giving of time or by any acts of the master done in obedience to the charterer's orders (Re Tyrer & Co. and Hessler & Co., supra).

SECT. 1. Charter-parties.

difference, such as, for example, the difference of freight, if any (n).

Option to select cargo.

178. The charterparty frequently gives the charterer an option to ship various kinds of cargo, which may be described as, for instance, "wheat and/or (o) seed and/or grain" (p). In this case the cargo tendered may be wholly composed of one of the specified kinds, or it may be a mixture of as many kinds as the charterer thinks fit, provided that the goods which make up the cargo correspond with the description in the charterparty (q). The only limitation upon the exercise of the option is that the cargo, whether all of one kind or not, must not be unreasonable as regards the nature of the goods which the charterer presents (r). The shipowner cannot complain of the manner in which the option has been exercised and claim damages on the ground that, if the charterer had exercised the option differently, the freight payable would have been greater (s). It is, therefore, not unusual to introduce a stipulation limiting the exercise of the option and specifying, in the case of those goods which are less profitable to the shipowner, the maximum amount which may be shipped (t).

General ship.

179. Where the ship is chartered as a general ship, or under a time charter, the charterparty is usually silent as to the kind of cargo which may be shipped, or describes it only as lawful merchandise (a). The charterer is in such case entitled to use the ship for the carriage of any goods within that description, provided that they are not forbidden by law to be shipped (b).

Dangerous goods.

The shipment of goods of a dangerous nature is not prohibited by law (c). If, therefore, the shipowner wishes to preclude the charterer from shipping such goods, he must insert a special stipulation in the contract (d). Goods, however, which those employed on the shipowner's behalf may not on inspection be reasonably expected to know to be of a dangerous nature (e) must not be shipped without notice (f); otherwise the charterer is responsible for any damage which may ensue (g). Where, on the other hand, the shipowner is acquainted with the nature of the goods, whether by notice from the charterer or otherwise, and consents to carry them, he takes the risk upon himself and cannot hold the charterer responsible (h).

Amount of cargo.

of a dangerous nature, see M. S. Act, 1894, ss. 446—449; Explosive Substances Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 3); p. 79, ante, p. 345, post; title EXPLOSIVES, Vol. XIV., pp. 384, 385.

B. 574 (where the option was to ship a further 8 per cent., and it was held that this was to be calculated upon the amount specified, and not upon that amount plus the margin allowed by the contract). The damages claimed for failure to furnish a full cargo are sometimes termed "dead freight." For the measure of damages see pp. 207 et seq., post.

SECT. 1. Charter-parties.

the charterer a reasonable margin (n); he does not therefore break his contract by delivering a quantity greater or less than that specified, provided that, in spite of the difference in quantity, he does not exceed or fall short of the margin allowed (o). More usually the stipulation provides that the charterer is to ship a full and complete cargo (p). In this case, unless the capacity of the ship has been fraudulently misrepresented (q) or unless it is the subject of a condition (r), the charterer must provide a cargo which will fill the whole of the cargo space in the ship (s). He cannot, however, be called upon or claim the right to fill those parts of the ship in which it is not usual to carry cargo (t), although it may be possible to do so (a). Nor can he be required to ship the cargo packed in any other than the usual packages (b), or, where the space occupied in Freight is payable to the shipowner, if goods are so carried (Mitcheson v. Nicol, supra; The "Ursula Bright" Steamship Co. v. Ripley (1903), 8 Com. Cas. 171), even where the shipper has contracted with the charterers (Neill v. Ridley, supra), unless the charterer has been compelled by the shipowner to fill such spaces, and has filled them under protest (Jardine, Matheson & Co. v. Clyde Shipping Co., supra, where the charterer was held entitled to recover the freight back after payment).

proportion to weight varies according to the condition of the cargo, to tender it in any other than the normal condition of such cargoes at the season when it is shipped (c). If the cargo as shipped is a full and complete cargo, it is immaterial that there is a large space left which might have been filled if a different mode of packing had been adopted, or that more cargo could have been carried if the goods tendered had been more compressed (d). The stipulation may, however, provide that goods are to be shipped for broken stowage (e), in which case the charterer is bound to fill any space which may be left after the specified cargo has been shipped (f). On the other hand, if only a portion of the ship's cargo space is chartered, the shipowner is entitled to carry goods for his own profit in the remaining space (g). He is also entitled to ship goods in place of ballast, provided that he does not encroach upon the cargo space proper (h).

Duties of shipowner.

181. The shipowner in his turn must provide a ship capable of carrying the specified quantity of cargo (i). Where, however, the cargo supplied is so bulky that the specified quantity cannot be carried if proper methods of stowage are adopted, he cannot be required to adopt an improper method for the purpose of enabling the whole cargo to be taken on board (k).

(iv.) As to the Freight or Hire.

Voyage charter.

182. A voyage charter may contain various stipulations as to freight (l). The stipulation may provide for the payment of a lump sum as freight (m). Such sum is not, strictly speaking, freight at all, but is in the nature of a rent for the use and hire of the ship on the agreed voyage (n). It is, therefore, payable irrespective of the quantity of cargo put on board (o) or delivered (p). Except (e) See Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. XIV., p. 106. Where the charterer has an option as to what kind of cargo he will supply, the stipulation as to broken stowage may apply to one kind of cargo and not to another (Duckett v. Satterfield (1868), L. R. 3 C. P. 227).

SECT. 1. Charter-parties.

where the freight is a lump sum, the charterparty specifies the rate at which the freight is payable, and the unit of weight or measurement upon which the amount payable is to be calculated (q). Different rates of freight are usually specified where the cargo is to be composed of different kinds of goods (r), or where the charterer has the option of ordering the ship to ports in different areas (s). Since, in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary, freight is payable on the cargo as delivered (t), and is not due until delivery (a), provision may be made for freight to be payable on the cargo as shipped (b), and also for the payment of at least a portion in advance (c). In any case, it is usually provided that sufficient cash for the ship's ordinary disbursements (d) is to be advanced to the master, if required by him at the port of loading; such advance, which is to be free of interest and commission, is to be deducted from the freight with the cost of insurance thereon (e). The charterparty may expressly provide that the freight is to be in full of trimming and of all port charges, pilotages, and consulages on the ship (f).

Time charter.

183. A time charter usually provides for the payment of a stipulated sum per month (g) as the hire of the chartered ship (h). It is usually provided that the hire, or, as it is often called, the freight, is to be paid in advance (i); otherwise the ship may be

R. 480; British and South American Steamship Co. v. Anglo-Argentine Live Stock and Produce Agency (1902), 18 T. L. R. 382).

(f) See Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. XIV., p. 101. This stipulation is, however, unnecessary; see p. 218, post. For loading expenses generally, see p. 218, post.

(g) This is a calendar month (Jolly v. Young (1794), 1 Esp. 186); see title TIME, Vol. XXVII., p. 437. Where freight is made payable in proportion for part of a month, a fraction of a day is to be reckoned as a whole day (Angier Brothers v. Stewart Brothers (1884), Cab. & El. 357).

(h) See Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. XIV., pp. 93, 97.

(i) A full month's payment must be made in advance, even though the ship will in all probability be redelivered to the shipowner before the withdrawn by the shipowner (k). The charter usually provides that if the ship is lost, any freight paid in advance and not earned (l), reckoning from the date of the loss, is to be returned to the charterer (m). If, however, the ship is not lost, but merely delayed, the hire continues to be payable, notwithstanding the loss of time (n), unless the delay is attributable to the shipowner's default (o), or to some excepted cause (p). It is usually stipulated that, in the event of time being lost for more than twenty-four hours through the breakdown of machinery or damage preventing the working of the ship or her tackle (q), payment of freight is, except in certain specified cases (r), to cease until the ship is in an efficient state to resume her service (s).

(v.) As to Signing Bills of Lading.

184. A voyage charter frequently provides for the use of a expiration of the month (Tonnelier and Bolckow, Vaughan & Co. v. Smith, Weatherill & Co. (1897), 2 Com. Cas. 258, C. A. (where the stipulation provided for a proportionate payment for part of a month); compare Reindeer Steamship Co. v. Forslind & Son (1908), 13 Com. Cas. 214, C. A.).

(k) See Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. XIV., pp. 93, 98; pp. 98, 99, ante. On withdrawal the shipowner is only entitled to claim freight for the time during which the ship was actually in the charterer's service (Wehner v. Dene Steam Shipping Co., [1905] 2 K. B. 92).

(l) As to when the freight is not earned, see Gibbon v. Mendez (1818), 2 B. & Ald. 17, where it was held that no freight was earned if the ship never reached her first port abroad, the charterparty providing for the first payment of freight within ten days after arrival at such port; Smith v. Wilson (1807), 8 East, 437; Mackrell v. Simond and Hankey (1776), cited in Abbott on Shipping, 5th ed., p. 332; 14th ed., p. 743; 2 Chit. 666.

C. 48, where the ship was towed from Las Palmas to Harburg). In that case, however, there was a special arrangement as to the expenses of towage, and it was suggested that if the shipowner had himself provided the tug, he might have been able to claim on a quantum meruit as for a substituted service (ibid., per Lord WATSON, at p. 60, and per Lord HERSCHELL, at p. 64); see also The Durham City (1889), 14 P. SECT. 1. Charter-parties.

specified form of bill of lading (t). It is usually stipulated that the bill of lading is to be signed subject to the qualification that the quality, condition and weight or quantity of the cargo shipped is unknown (u); where, however, the stipulation is that the master is to give a clean bill of lading, no qualifications may be inserted (v). The conditions (a) of the charterparty may be expressly incorporated into the bill of lading (b); and provision may be made for the number of sets of bills of lading which the master may be required to sign (c), and for the signing of the bills of lading within a specified time (d).

Provisions as to freight.

185. As the master cannot, in the absence of express stipulation, be required to insert in the bill of lading a less rate of freight than that reserved by the charterparty (e), it is not unusual, where the charterer intends to sublet the ship or to employ her in the carriage of goods belonging to third persons, to provide that the master is to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight without prejudice to the charterparty (f). The object of this provision is to facilitate the handling of the cargo by the issue of bills of lading direct to the shippers (g), and to prevent the inconvenience which exists where the charterer takes a bill of lading to himself from the master and issues his own bills of lading to the shippers (h). It becomes necessary, under such a provision, in the interests of the shipowner either to stipulate for the payment in advance of the difference, where the bill of lading freight is less than the chartered

After the ship having put back for repairs becomes efficient, hire is payable for the voyage from the port of repairs to the place where the accident happened (Vogeman v. Zanzibar Steamship Co., Ltd. (1902), 7 Com. freight (i), or to give him a lien for the chartered freight over all goods carried and over all freights payable to the charterer (k). The charterer may also be required by an express stipulation to indemnify the shipowner from all consequences or liabilities that may arise from the master signing bills of lading or in complying with them (l).

(vi.) As to Excepted Perils Relieving the Shipowner.

Extent of shipowner's liability.

186. Since the shipowner is, at common law, responsible as an insurer for the safety of the goods carried on his ship, except where his failure to carry safely is attributable to the act of God or the King's enemies, or to an inherent defect in the goods, or to the default of their owner (m), it is usual for the charterparty to contain an express stipulation specifying certain perils as excepted from the contract (n). The effect of this stipulation is to relieve the shipowner from responsibility either for the safety of the goods or for the performance of the contract of carriage (o), whenever loss or damage is occasioned to cargo or the performance of the contract is

P. 468, Ex. Ch., where the charterers, being unable to supply a cargo, guaranteed a specified sum if the ship was employed elsewhere, and were held liable notwithstanding the loss of the ship; Anderson, Anderson & Co. v. English and American Shipping Co., Ltd., and Bowring (C. J.) & Co. (1895), 1 Com. Cas. 85.

(k) Such a stipulation is not binding on third parties unless incorporated in the bill of lading (Turner v. Haji Goolam Mahomed Azam, [1904] A. C. 826, P. C.). Notice of the charterparty is not sufficient (Chappel v. Comfort (1861), 10 C. B. (N. S.) 802), or even a reference to the rate of freight fixed thereby (Fry v. Chartered Mercantile Bank of India (1866), L. R. 1 C. P. 689; Gardner v. Trechmann, supra); see p. 176, post.

(m) Liver Alkali Co. v. Johnson (1874), L. R. 9 Exch. 338, Ex. Ch.; Nugent v. Smith (1876), 1 C. P. D. 423, C. A.; Hill v. Scott, [1895] 2 Q. B. 371; see p. 325, post. Co.*, [1913] 3 K. B. 15.

(n) See Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. XIV., pp. 96, 99, 102, 108, 116. The implied warranty of seaworthiness (as to which see pp. 186 et seq., 211 et seq., post) is not excluded by reason of the exceptions (Steel v. State Line Steamship Co. (1877), 3 App. Cas. 72, followed in Gilroy, Sons & Co. v. Price & Co., [1893] A. C. 56; Tattersall v. National Steamship Co. (1884), 12 Q. B. D. 297; The Glenfruin (1885), 10 P. D. 103; Ship "Maori King" (Owners of Cargo) v. Hughes, [1895] 2 Q. B. 550, C. A.), but it may be expressly modified (Cargo ex Laertes (1887), 12 P. D. 187). Sometimes the contract excludes liability except for certain specified perils (East India Co. v. Tod (1788), 1 Bro. Parl. Cas. 405).

SECT. 1. Charter-parties.

prevented (p) by reason of any of the perils therein specified (q). The perils which are usually (r) excepted from the contract are the act of God, the King's enemies, restraints of princes and rulers, perils of the seas, fire, barratry, pirates, collisions, strandings and accidents of navigation, but defects, leakages and breakages, and negligence of servants are also in practice frequently excepted.

Act of God.

187. The act of God. Though this exception is implied at common law (s), it is generally inserted in the stipulation, probably to prevent any possibility of the inference being drawn, from its omission from a list of excepted perils, that the parties did not intend to include it (t). It denotes natural accidents, such as lightning, earthquake and tempest (a). To exempt the shipowner, he must show that the accident was due to natural causes directly and exclusively, and not to human intervention (b), and that it could not have been prevented by any amount of foresight, pains, and care reasonably to be expected from him (c).

King's enemies.

188. The King's enemies. This exception is also implied at common law (d), but is in practice always inserted in the stipulation. It applies only to the acts of public enemies, that is to say, hostile acts committed by the forces of a state at war with the United Kingdom (e), or, if the ship chartered is a foreign ship, with the country to which the ship belongs (f).

(q) As to the application of the doctrine of proximate cause, see pp. 232, 233, post; as to when the excepted perils begin to be operative, see p. 202, post. This list of perils should be compared with the perils enumerated in title INSURANCE, Vol. XVII., pp. 432 et seq.

(r) It is impossible to deal in detail with all the varieties of exceptions which may be introduced to meet particular cases. Such exceptions as have been judicially considered, apart from those referred to in the text, supra, and pp. 109—118, post, are dealt with in connexion with the duties of the shipowner which they modify. As to the exceptions relieving the charterer, see pp. 129 et seq., post.

(b) The exception does not apply where, though the loss is occasioned by the act of God, the efficient cause, without which the act of God would have been inoperative, was negligence (Siordet v. Hall (1828), 4 Bing. 607); and see title NEGLIGENCE, Vol. XXI., pp. 467 et seq.

Restraints of princes and rulers.

189. Restraints of princes and rulers. This exception includes every case in which the voyage is interrupted by lawful authority (g). It therefore applies to seizure of the ship or cargo or of both by the government either of the United Kingdom or of a friendly country for state purposes (h). It is not, however, necessary to prove an actual seizure (i). It is sufficient if the performance of the contract is rendered impossible by an embargo (k), or by a prohibition against landing the cargo (l), or otherwise by any intervention of the forces of the government concerned, such as, for instance, in the case of war breaking out between two friendly states, a blockade at the port of discharge, whereby it becomes useless to send the ship to the port of loading (m), or a siege, by which it is rendered impossible to carry the cargo to its destination (n). The exception does not, however, apply where performance becomes impossible by means of the act or decision of any court or judicial tribunal (o); nor does it apply, even where the word "people" is included, to the plundering of the cargo by a mob, since the word "people" is to be construed in connexion with the other words of the exception, and means the supreme power of the country (p).

not to apply to the commencement of war between two foreign states. In all probability it does not apply to the acts of pirates (Russell v. Niemann, (1864), 17 C. B. (N. S.) 163, per BYLES, J., at p. 175; compare Forward v. Pittard (1785), 1 Term Rep. 27, per Lord MANSFIELD, C.J., at p. 34).

(g) Russell v. Niemann, supra, per BYLES, J., at p. 175; Bruce v. Nicolopulo (1855), 11 Exch. 129. Civil war is within the exception (Smith and Service v. Rosario Nitrate Co., [1894] 1 Q. B. 174, C. A.), but not, apparently, an unauthorised seizure by government officials (Evans v. Hutton (1842), 5 Scott (N. R.), 670). Delay in quarantine does not fall within the exception (Aktieselskabet et "Lina" v. Turnbull & Co., [1907] S. C. 507).

(h) Crew, Widgery & Co. v. Great Western Steamship Co., [1887] W. N. 161. But a seizure due to the negligence of the shipowner in taking on board prohibited goods is not within the exception (Dunn v. Bucknall Brothers, Dunn v. Donald Currie & Co., [1902] 2 K. B. 614, C. A.). On the other hand, if the contract does not contain any such exception, the shipowner is liable, even though there is no ground for the seizure (Gosling v. Higgins (1808), 1 Camp. 451).

(m) Geipel v. Smith (1872), L. R. 7 Q. B. 404. A reasonable apprehension of seizure is sufficient (Anderson v. The "San Roman" (Owners), The "San Roman" (1873), L. R. 5 P. C. 301; Nobel's Explosives Co. v. Jenkins & Co., [1896] 2 Q. B. 326). On the other hand a contract to run a blockade is not unlawful (The Helen (1865), L. R. 1 A. & E. 1), and an action may be brought for its breach, the measure of damages depending upon whether, in the opinion of the jury, the blockade could have been successfully run (Medeiros v. Hill (1832), 8 Bing. 231).

SECT. 1. Charter-parties.

Perils of the seas.

190. Perils of the seas (q). This exception applies in the first instance wherever there is loss or damage to goods caused by the action of the sea (r) during transit, which is not attributable to the fault of anybody (s). There must, however, be some casualty, something which could not be foreseen as one of the necessary incidents of the voyage (t). The exception does not, therefore, cover every loss or damage of which the sea is the immediate cause (a). Thus, it does not protect against that natural and inevitable action of the winds and waves which results in what may be described as wear and tear (b). Nor does it apply where the loss does not take place at sea (c), or where, though the loss takes place at sea, the sea, or the fact that the ship is at sea, has nothing to do with the loss (d).

(q) The phrase "perils of the seas" has the same meaning as in a policy of marine insurance (Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Co. v. Hamilton, Fraser & Co. (1887), 12 App. Cas. 484; Wilson, Sons & Co. v. The "Xantho" (Owners of Cargo) (1887), 12 App. Cas. 503; Hamilton, Fraser & Co. v. Pandorf & Co. (1887), 12 App. Cas. 518); see, further, title INSURANCE, Vol. XVII., pp. 432 et seq.

(r) The burden of proof rests on the shipowner (Beckford v. Clerke (1666), 1 Keb. 830; Wilson, Sons & Co. v. The "Xantho" (Owners of Cargo), supra). The exception does not apply to rivers and canals (Abbott on Shipping, 5th ed., p. 257), unless the words "rivers and canals" are included (Phillips on Insurance, s. 1099); for an express exception of "rivers," see Pyman v. Burt (1884), Cab. & El. 207; and compare De Rothschild v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Co. (1852), 7 Exch. 734. It, however, covers all perils connected with the sea, and includes pirates (Pickering v. Barkley (1648), Sty. 132) and wreckers (Bondrett v. Hentigg (1816), Holt (N. P.), 149), but not confiscation by the order of a court (Spence v. Chodwick (1847), 10 Q. B. 517; compare Benson v. Duncan (1849), 3 Exch. 644, Ex. Ch.). But an express provision that the goods, whilst elsewhere, are to be at ship's risk means that the shipowner's liability is to be the same as if they were on board (Nottebohn v. Richter (1886), 18 Q. B. D. 63, C. A.; compare Johnston v. Benson (1819), 1 Brod. & Bing. 454, where the contract imposed on the shipowner the risk of boats so far as ships are liable thereto, and it was held that he was not liable for a loss occasioned by perils of the sea whilst the goods were in a boat; Webster & Co. and Anderson & Co. v. Bond and Storey (1884), Cab. & El. 338. But the exception may be so framed as to make the shipowner absolutely liable until the goods are put on board (Dampskibsselskabet "Skjoldborg" v. Calder (Charles) & Co. (1912), 17 Com. Cas. 97).

(d) Hamilton, Fraser & Co. v. Pandorf & Co., supra, per Lord

Moreover, a loss which would otherwise fall within the exception is excluded from its operation if the loss would not have taken place but for the shipowner's negligence or failure to fulfil his duty, for example, by providing a seaworthy ship (e).

The exception is equally applicable though the inroad of the sea which occasions the loss or damage is induced by some intervention of human agency (f), provided that there is no negligence or default on the part of the shipowner or his servants (g). Thus, the shipowner is excused where the loss or damage is caused by a collision which is a pure accident on the part of both ships (h), or in which the other ship is wholly to blame (i), or by a voluntary stranding to avoid sinking (k). If, however, the collision is attributable wholly (l), or in part (m), to the fault of the ship in question, or if the stranding results from negligent navigation on the part of the master or crew (n), this exception no longer applies (o). Similarly the exception does not apply to a loss occasioned by the barratry of the master or crew (p).

191. Fire. The shipowner is in fact protected by statute where goods on board his ship are destroyed or damaged by fire (q) without his actual fault or privity (r), whether there has been a breach of warranty of seaworthiness or not (s). If, however, he is by the terms of his contract with the charterer responsible for the safety of the goods, either before they are put on board or after they leave the ship, and they are destroyed or damaged by fire whilst on the way to or from the ship, the statutory protection no longer applies (t). Nor is the shipowner protected by an exception against perils of the seas, since fire is not a peril of the sea (u). If, therefore, he is to be fully protected, an express exception against fire is necessary (a).

Barratry.

192. Barratry of the master and crew. This exception includes every wrongful act wilfully committed by the master or crew to the prejudice of the shipowner (b). There is no barratry where the act is committed with his sanction or privity (c). The master to be guilty of barratry must have deliberately violated his duty to his employer and acted against his better judgment (d). No act of negligence (e), inadvertence (f), or mistake (g), therefore, amounts to barratry. On the other hand, the master's motive is immaterial; it may equally be barratry whether he intends to benefit himself and deceive the shipowner (h), or whether he seeks to provision may be excluded by the terms of the express contract between the parties (Virginia Carolina Chemical Co. v. Norfolk and North American Steam Shipping Co., [1912] 1 K. B. 229, C. A. (c) Nutt v. Bourdieu, supra. But it may be barratry within the meaning of a policy effected by the charterer (Ionides v. Pender (1874), L. R. 9 Q. B. 531). An owner cannot be guilty of barratry (ibid.), though a part owner may be (Jones v. Nicholson (1854), 10 Exch. 28).

advance the shipowner's interest (i). Thus, he is guilty of barratry where he deviates from his course for the purpose of smuggling goods for his own benefit (k), though a mere deviation, not on the face of it fraudulent or criminal, is not barratry (l). He is also guilty where he employs the ship in trading with an alien enemy, even though he intends to hand over the profits to the shipowner (m).

193. Pirates. This exception is usually inserted, although pirates are equally within the exception against perils of the sea (n). All persons are pirates who, in any place within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty (o), violently dispossess the master and carry away the ship or any of the goods on board with a felonious intent (p); it is immaterial whether they are members of the crew (q), passengers (r), or strangers (s). Even rioters who attack the ship from the shore may be included in the term (t). Pirates.

Where the exception includes the word "robbers," the shipowner is only protected where violence has been used; he remains liable to the charterer where the loss is due to pilfering (a). Robbers.

Sometimes the exception is extended to include the word "thieves." Here, too, the shipowner may not be protected unless violence has been used (b); nor is he protected, even where violence is used, unless he can show that the theft was committed by a stranger to the ship (c). For all persons belonging to the ship, Thieves.

whether as members of the crew or as passengers (d), and for all persons in his service employed on board the ship (e), he is responsible. Even where the exception is so framed as to include thieves of whatever kind, whether on board or not, he remains responsible for all persons in his service, and is only excused when the thief, though lawfully on board, has nothing to do with the service of the ship (f).

Collisions.

194. Collisions, strandings, and accidents of navigation. In the case of a collision (g) this exception (h), does not protect the shipowner, where the collision is attributable either wholly or in part to the negligence or default of his own master or crew (i).

Strandings.

A ship is not stranded within the meaning of the exception where she takes the ground in the ordinary course of navigation (k), unless owing to the state of the ground there is some hidden danger, the existence of which could not reasonably have been anticipated (l). To bring the case within the exception, the stranding must be accidental (m), as, for instance, where the ship runs into a tidal harbour for shelter and takes the ground (n). If, therefore, the stranding is due to negligence of the master the exception does not apply (o).

Accidents of navigation.

An accident is that which happens without the fault of anybody (p) for whom the shipowner is responsible (q). An act is none the less an accident because it is attributable to the negligence or default of a stranger (r). Where, however, the negligence or default is on the part of the master or crew, the exception no longer applies (s).

Since the exception is limited to accidents of navigation, it only applies whilst the ship is being navigated in the course of her voyage, and ceases to be operative as soon as she is finally (t) moored in dock with the intention that she is to remain there until her cargo is discharged (u). It does not apply to accidents which take place before the commencement of the voyage, such as, for instance, accidents arising out of the stowage of the cargo (a).

Latent defects.

195. Latent defects (b) in or accidents to hull and/or machinery and/or boilers (c). This exception does not exclude the implied warranty of seaworthiness (d); for that purpose special words must be inserted (e); nor does it apply where the shipowner is guilty of negligence (f).

Leakage and breakage.

196. Leakage and breakage. This exception covers loss or damage arising from leakage or breakage of the goods which are the subject-matter of the contract (g), but not loss or damage caused to such goods by the leakage or breakage of other goods carried on board unless expressly so stated (h). It does not apply where there is negligence on the part of the shipowner or his servants (i): in case of negligence, therefore, it is immaterial whether the loss or damage is attributable to the leakage or breakage of the goods

Negligence.

197. Negligence. Since the various exceptions already mentioned do not protect the shipowner where the peril which causes the loss is attributable to the negligence of persons in his service, it is usual for the charterparty to contain a negligence clause extending the scope of the exceptions to such negligence (n). A negligence clause is valid and enforceable (o), provided that it is clear and unambiguous in its terms (p). It must expressly refer to negligence, since it is always strictly construed against the shipowner (q). A clause will not, therefore, be held to protect him against the consequences of negligence merely because it is framed in terms so wide as to be capable of including negligence (r).

A negligence clause does not exclude the implied condition that the ship is to be seaworthy (s); nor does it protect the shipowner against the consequences of his personal negligence or default (t). Moreover, it applies only to such acts of negligence as fall strictly within its scope (a). Thus, an exception as to negligence in

For the United States, the Harter Act (Public Statutes, No. 57 of 1893) prohibits the insertion of negligence clauses in bills of lading and other shipping documents, but relieves a shipowner who has exercised due diligence from responsibility in certain cases. This statute is frequently incorporated into contracts for the carriage of goods to and from the United States, and has been considered in the following cases:—Dobell & Co. v. Steamship Rossmore Co., [1895] 2 Q. B. 408, C. A.; The Glenochil, [1896] P. 10; The Rodney, [1900] P. 112; Rowson v. Atlantic Transport Co., [1903] 2 K. B. 666, C. A.; Elder, Dempster & Co. v. Dunn (1909), 15 Com. (r) Thus, an exception of loss or damage capable of being covered by insurance is not sufficient (Moore v. Harris (1876), 1 App. Cas. 318, P. C.; Price & Co. v. Union Lighterage Co., supra; Travers (Joseph) & Sons, Ltd. v. Cooper (1913), 30 T. L. D. 521, C. A., per BRETT, L.J., at p. 539. Where the owner is also master, an exception as to "negligence of the master" covers his acts as master, though not his acts as owner (Westport Coal Co. v. McPhail, [1898] 2 Q. B. 130, C. A.).

navigation (b) protects the shipowner only during the course of the voyage; it does not cover negligence in stowage (c) or negligence after the voyage is ended, though the cargo is not yet discharged (d). The clause may, however, be so framed as to cover the whole time that the ship is employed in the performance of the contract (e), and to apply to all acts of negligence of whatever description (f), including negligent stowage (g). But the exception does not protect the shipowner where the negligence which causes the loss is attributable partly to his servants and partly to strangers (h).

Negligence clauses vary considerably in their scope and language (i), and are constantly being extended in consequence of judicial decisions (k). Negligence is sometimes treated as a substantive peril and inserted in the list of exceptions (l). More usually a negligence clause is added to the list by way of qualification. Thus, according to a form in common use, it is stipulated that the specified perils are to be excepted even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot (m), master, mariner, or other persons employed by the shipowner or for whose acts he is responsible, not resulting, however, in any case from want of due diligence by the shipowner or by the ship's husband or manager (n).

SECT. 1. Charter-parties.

How far exceptions mutual.

198. The exceptions are, strictly speaking, inserted for the protection of the shipowner (o). They do not in the absence of words implying mutuality protect the charterer (p), and he is not excused from performing his part of the contract because his failure to do so is occasioned by a peril excepted in the charterparty (q). The charterparty may, however, contain a stipulation by which the shipowner and the charterer mutually exempt each other from all liabilities arising from the excepted perils (r), and in this case the charterer is protected equally with the shipowner (s). More usually the charterparty, in the stipulations dealing with the obligations imposed on the charterer, defines the circumstances in which he is to be excused from the performance of them (t).

(vii.) As to Loading and Discharge.

Custom of the port.

199. The loading and discharge of a cargo are governed by the customs of the particular port concerned (a), except where such customs are expressly excluded (b), or are otherwise inconsistent with the terms of the charterparty (c). Where, on the other hand, it is intended that the customs of the port are to apply, it is not unusual to insert a stipulation to that effect (d).

A charterparty usually stipulates that the cargo is to be brought to and taken from alongside at the charterer's risk and expense (e). Where, however, it is necessary to employ boats for the purpose, the risk and expense of so doing may be imposed, by express stipulation, upon the shipowner (f). In the same way the charterparty may extend the obligations of the charterer, and may require him to provide either wholly (g) or in part (h) for the shipment, stowage, or discharge of the cargo (i). In this case he may be protected by a negligence clause against the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the persons employed by him (k). When his responsibility ceases at the ship's side, he may be empowered to place an agent on board for the purpose of supervising his interests (l).

(viii.) As to the Time for Loading and Discharge.

Sailing telegrams.

200. As it is the duty of the charterer to have his cargo ready for the ship on her arrival at the port of loading (m), the charterparty usually stipulates for the sending of a sailing telegram, that is to say, a telegram giving notice to the charterer of the probable date of arrival (n). To enable the charterer to complete the preparation the sailing telegram must be sent some time beforehand; the charterparty, therefore, fixes the length of notice which is to be given, either by specifying a particular number of days (o) or, more usually, by providing that the telegram is to be sent from the last port of call on the outward voyage (p). This stipulation is not treated as a condition, and it is usually provided that the effect of a breach is to extend the time allowed to the charterer for loading (q).

Time for loading.

201. The charterparty may stipulate that the cargo is to be loaded within a specified period (r). This period, according to the ordinary form of stipulation (s), begins when written notice is given to the charterer that the ship is ready to receive cargo (t). Sometimes it may be stipulated that the period is not to begin before a certain date, unless both ship and cargo are ready (a). It is a condition of the charterparty that the charterer is to provide a cargo within the specified period, and his failure to do so entitles the shipowner to treat the contract as at an end (b), and also to sue for damages (c). The cause of the charterer's failure is immaterial, whether it is attributable to his own default (d) or to circumstances beyond his control (e). It is, however, usual to stipulate that where, owing to the happening of one or other of certain specified events (f), the loading of the cargo is delayed, any time lost thereby is not to be counted as part of the period (g), and where it becomes impossible, for the same reason, to perform the contract, the charterparty is to become void (h). In this case the charterer is absolved from his obligation to procure a cargo, and is not responsible for his inability to do so (i).

Where the detention of the ship at the port of loading beyond the specified time is attributable to the default of the shipowner or of persons for whom he is responsible, the charterer is not liable to pay demurrage (k).

Time for discharge.

202. The stipulation relating to the discharge of the cargo may specify the period within which the discharge is to take place (l), or may fix it inferentially by providing that a given quantity of cargo is to be discharged per day (m). If the period is exceeded, the charterer must pay damages (n), unless, as in the case of loading, the cause of delay is expressly covered by some provision in the charterparty (o), or unless the delay is attributable to some default on the part of the shipowner (p). The fact that the delay is attributable to the fault of third persons over whom the charterer or shipowner has no control is immaterial (q).

Customary dispatch.

203. Sometimes the charterparty, instead of fixing a definite period for loading or unloading, may stipulate merely that the cargo is to be loaded and discharged with customary dispatch (r). The effect of this stipulation is that the charterer has a reasonable time within which to perform his obligation either of providing a cargo or of taking delivery (s); and where the charterparty is silent there is an implication that a reasonable time will be allowed (t). In considering what is a reasonable time the actual circumstances of the particular case must be taken into consideration (u), and the charterer is not to be held responsible for delay attributable to circumstances beyond his control (a).

Lay days.

204. The period specified in the charterparty is usually expressed in days, which are known as lay days (b). At the expiration of the lay days, the charterer may be allowed, in consideration of an additional payment, called demurrage (c), a further number of days, known as demurrage days (d). Sometimes no further time is expressly allowed, but it is simply stipulated that the charterer is to pay demurrage at the rate of so much a day for every day that the ship is detained beyond the lay days (e). It is therefore important, for the purpose both of ascertaining when the lay days expire and the payment of demurrage begins and of calculating the amount of demurrage payable, to define what is meant by the word "day" in a charterparty (f). In practice its meaning is usually made more or less clear by the insertion of qualifications (g).

Demurrage days.

Construction.

205. The principal terms used in a charterparty relating to the time to be occupied in loading or discharge are the following, namely:—

Days.

Days. If used without any qualification, the term means consecutive days, including Sundays and holidays (h), unless there is a custom of the port to the contrary (i), or unless it is clear from the context that the parties intended a different meaning (k).

Running days.

Running days. This term also means consecutive days, including Sundays and holidays, unless such meaning is excluded by a custom of the port or by the context (l). In practice, it is usual to exclude Sundays and holidays, whether general or local, unless actually used for working (m).

Working days.

Working days. This term excludes Sundays and general holidays (n), but not days on which, owing to the state of the weather, it is impossible to work (o), even though it is not the custom of the port to count such days (p). It is therefore not unusual to qualify the term and to stipulate that only "weather working days" are to be counted (q). Where this is the case the charterer is not responsible for delay caused by bad weather (r). If it is only possible, owing to the weather, to work for a portion of a day, the day is not to be taken into account unless the work actually done amounts substantially to a day's work or half a day's work, in which case the day is to be counted as a day or half a day accordingly (s). Where a ship is chartered for the carriage of a cargo of coal, the term "colliery working days" may be used for the purpose of defining the period within which the charterer is to provide a cargo (t). This term means days which are ordinary working days at the colliery in normal circumstances, although no work may in fact be done at the colliery upon such days (a).

(f) Time is always reckoned by days, and not by hours (Hough v. Athya & Son (1879), 6 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 961), unless the contract expressly makes demurrage payable per hour (Marshall v. Bolckow (1881), 6 Q. B. D. 231). As to time generally, see title TIME, Vol. XXVII., pp. 431 et seq.

Colliery working days.

Days of twenty-four hours. In the absence of any stipulation in the charterparty, a day is reckoned as consisting of twenty-four consecutive hours (b), counted from midnight to midnight (c), and fractions of a day are not taken into consideration (d). If, therefore, the charterer on the ship being placed at his disposal in the middle of a day at once begins to load or unload, that day is to be counted as a day under the charterparty, even though he is unable to do more than a few hours' work in the time (e), and if he finishes the loading or unloading before the expiration of the second day he is to be deemed to have used two days, notwithstanding that the whole work may have been done within twenty-four hours from the time

But such days may be excluded where both parties are acquainted with the custom (British and Mexican Shipping Co., Ltd. v. Lockett Brothers & Co., Ltd., [1911] 1 K. B. 264, C. A. ("surf days")). As to the length of a "working day," see note (c), infra.

(r) But where the cargo is discharged into lighters, a day is a "weather working day" if the weather permits of the cargo being discharged into the lighters, even though the lighters cannot safely land the cargo owing to surf (Holman & Sons v. Peruvian Nitrate Co., supra; Bennetts & Co. v. Brown, supra).

when it began (f). To obviate this construction the parties may provide that, for the purposes of the charterparty, the term "day" is to signify a conventional day, having no relation to an astronomical day or to the ordinary civil day (g). The conventional day may be a period of twenty-four consecutive hours, commencing from a specified time (h), or, where the language of the charterparty is so framed, as, for instance, where the phrase used is "working day of twenty-four hours," the stipulation means that only the hours available for work are to be taken into consideration, and that twenty-four of such hours, whether consecutive or not, are to be taken together and treated as a day (i).

Charterer's right to demurrage days.

206. The specification of lay days and demurrage days (j) in the charterparty is equivalent to a contract on the part of the charterer that he will not delay the ship for a further period (k), and also to a contract on the part of the shipowner that during those days the ship is to be at the charterer's disposal (l). The charterer has therefore the right to make use of both the lay days and the demurrage days for the due performance of his obligation either to load or to discharge, and commits no breach of contract in detaining the ship until the expiration of the demurrage days (m). If the

But there may be a special stipulation empowering the shipowner to carry on the goods beyond their destination, if in the opinion of the master discharge cannot be effected without undue delay (Searle v. Lund (1904), 90 L. T. 529, C. A. (where the shipowner was held not to be excused, since any delay would have been attributable to his agent's default at a previous port).

(m) Dimech v. Corlett (1858), 12 Moo. P. C. C. 199, 231; Wilson and Coventry v. Thoresen's Linie, supra. The liability to pay demurrage depends upon the detention of the ship, and not upon the conduct of the charterer (Porteus v. Watney (1878), 3 Q. B. D. 534, C. A.; Straker v. Kidd (1878), 3 Q. B. D. 223). He is only excused where the detention is by the default of the shipowner (Benson v. Blunt (1841), 1 Q. B. 870; Bradley v. Goddard (1863), 3 F. & F. 638). The shipowner is not in default

charterparty does not specify the number of lay days, demurrage, where stipulated for, will become payable at the expiration of a reasonable time (n), and will continue to be payable, if the charterparty does not specify the number of demurrage days, until the expiration of such further time as may be reasonable in the circumstances (o). In this case also the charterer is entitled to detain the ship until she has been on demurrage for a reasonable time (p). Any further detention of the ship after the expiration of the demurrage days, or of a reasonable time for demurrage, as the case may be, is a breach of the charterer's contract for which he is liable in damages, the measure of damages being, as a general rule (q), the daily rate of demurrage mentioned in the charterparty (r).

Where demurrage payable.

207. Demurrage in the strict sense of the word (s) is only payable where there is an express stipulation to that effect (t). In the absence of any such stipulation the shipowner is not entitled to claim demurrage as such (u), nor can the charterer claim the right to detain the ship beyond the expiration of the time allowed by the charterparty for loading or discharging, as the case may be (a). If, therefore, he detains her for any further term, he is guilty of a merely because he is unable to deliver (Budgett & Co. v. Binnington & Co., [1891] 1 Q. B. 35, C. A.); the cause of his inability must be within his control (Hansen v. Donaldson & Sons (1874), 1 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 1066); see p. 272, post.

(o) Wilson and Coventry v. Thoresen's Linie (1910), 15 Com. Cas. 262; Lilly & Co. v. Stevenson & Co., (1895), 22 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 278.

(q) Either party may show that the actual loss is greater or less, as the case may be (Moorsom v. Bell (1811), 2 Camp. 616). Where, however, the charterparty does not specify any period of demurrage or provide that the demurrage rate is only to apply to a reasonable number of days, the demurrage rate applies in fact to the whole period during which the ship is detained (Western Steamship Co. v. Amaral Sutherland & Co., [1913] 3 K. B. 366).

(s) In popular use the word covers damages for detention (Lockhart v. Falk (1875), L. R. 10 Exch. 135, approved in Great Western Railway v. Phillips & Co., Ltd., [1908] A. C. 101, per Lord MACNAGHTEN, at p. 107).

The shipowner may in his turn contract to pay a specified sum per day if he is responsible for the ship's delay (Seeger v. Duthie (1860), 8 C. B. (N. S.) 45, 72, Ex. Ch.; Jones v. Hough (1879), 5 Ex. D. 115, C. A.); the contract may be so worded as to apply to delay during the voyage only, and not to delay in starting (Valente v. Gibbs (1859), 6 C. B. (N. SECT. 1. Charter-parties.

breach of contract, and is liable to pay damages for her detention as soon as the lay days expire (b).

Days saved.

208. Where the charterparty specifies the number of lay days to be allowed for loading and discharge respectively, the charterer is not at liberty to take into account any days saved at the port of loading, and to add them to the lay days allowed for discharge so as to escape liability for demurrage at the port of discharge (c), unless he is expressly permitted to do so by the terms of the charterparty (d).

When demurrage ceases.

209. The payment of demurrage ceases as soon as the charterer has fully performed his obligation of providing or taking away the cargo, and he is not responsible for any further delay not attributable to his default (e). Thus, if after the ship has been fully laden and her clearances obtained (f) she is unable to sail owing to bad weather, or is driven back to the port of loading, after sailing, by a storm, the shipowner's claim for demurrage does not continue or revive, as the case may be (g). On the other hand, the payment of demurrage is not suspended where the loading is interrupted by an excepted peril (h), unless the stipulation expressly so provides (i). Where, however, the ship by reason of a collision or otherwise is rendered unavailable for loading, or if she leaves the port, no demurrage is payable for the period whilst she is under repair or whilst she is absent (k).

When time begins to run.

210. Time does not begin to run against the charterer until the ship has been placed at his disposal (l). She is not at his disposal until she has reached the place named in the charterparty as the place where she is to take in or deliver her cargo, as the case may be, and until she is ready to do so (m). Where the place is merely designated in general terms, as for instance by the name of a port, difficult questions arise as to when the ship can be said to have arrived, within the meaning of the charterparty, at such port (n). Even where a particular dock is specified similar questions may arise (o). It is, therefore, not unusual to insert an express stipulation that the ship is to load or discharge at a particular berth (p). In this case she must be actually alongside the berth before the lay days begin to run (q).

Written notice of readiness.

211. A stipulation is frequently inserted providing for the giving of written notice that the ship is ready to load or discharge as the case may be (r). The stipulation may further provide that time is to run from the giving of such notice after arrival, whether the ship has reached her berth or not (s).

"In turn."

212. Sometimes the charterparty provides that the ship is to be loaded or discharged "in turn" or "in regular turn" (t). In this case the ship must take her turn with other ships in due order, and time does not begin to run against the charterer until her turn arrives (a). He is not, therefore, responsible for any delay arising from the ship having to wait for her turn in the ordinary course (b), but only for such delay as is attributable to his own default (c), as for instance where the ship loses her turn owing to the fact that he is not ready to deliver or take the cargo (d). other hand, the ship loses her turn in consequence of some default on the part of the shipowner, any loss occasioned by the delay falls on the shipowner and not on the charterer (e).

The meaning of the term "in turn" varies according to circumstances. Ships may be entitled to take their turn in order of arrival (f) or in order of readiness (g); steamships may have precedence over sailing ships (h); and one kind of cargo may be loaded before another (i). In any particular case the meaning to be attached to the term may have to be ascertained by reference to the custom of the port (k). If there is only one person at the port from whom the cargo can be obtained (l), or to whom it can be delivered (m), the practice followed by him will bind the shipowner as being the custom of the port; if, however, there are several persons available, the practice of the person actually chosen, if differing from the custom of the port, will not excuse a delay which would not have happened if the charterer had chosen a person whose practice accorded with the custom of the port (n).

Dispatch money.

213. Since the charterer is entitled to the whole of the lay days for the purpose of loading or discharging his cargo (o), it is not unusual for the charterparty to contain a stipulation providing for the payment of what is called dispatch money by the shipowner to the charterer, for any time saved either in the loading or in the discharging (p). As in the case of demurrage (q), dispatch money is payable at a given rate per day or hour saved (r). In reckoning the time saved the language of the particular stipulation must be

(p) Dispatch money may be made payable only in respect of time saved in discharging (Rowland and Marwood's Steamship Co. v. Wilson, Sons & Co. (1897), 2 Com. Cas. 198). As to the meaning of "time saved," see Laing v. Hollway (1878), 3 Q. B. D. 437, C. taken into account (a). Unless there is something in the contract to show the contrary, the charterer is entitled to be credited with the whole of the time saved; if dispatch money is payable per hour he counts every hour saved, whether a working hour or not, so that a day saved amounts to twenty-four hours for the purpose of dispatch money (b). Similarly, every day saved counts, whether or not it is a day excepted from the lay days by the charterparty (c), such as a Sunday or a holiday (d), unless upon the construction of the charterparty it appears to have been the intention of the parties that such excepted days were not to be counted for this purpose (e).

Scope of exceptions.

214. It is usual for the charterer to protect himself by express stipulation against the consequences of delay in the performance of his obligations (f). Sometimes the exceptions which relieve the shipowner from responsibility are made equally available for the charterer (g). More frequently the stipulations which define the charterer's obligations do not impose upon him an absolute duty to fulfil them, but exempt him from liability where his failure to do so is occasioned by certain specified events, which are thus excepted from the charterparty (h). The stipulation in its ordinary form provides that any time lost, whether in the loading or in the

(d) If work is done upon an excepted day by arrangement, that day does not become a lay day unless there is an agreement to that effect, which is not to be implied from the mere fact of working on that day by consent; dispatch money is, therefore, payable as upon the original period (Nelson (James) & Sons v. Nelson Line (Liverpool), Ltd., [1908] A. C. 108).

C. 12; see Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. XIV., p. 99. It has been held that the ordinary exceptions in a charterparty (for which see pp. 107 et seq., ante) also protect the charterer; see Barrie v. Peruvian Corporation (1896), 2 Com. Cas. 50 (voyage charter), where it was held that the wording of the particular clause clearly implied mutuality. This case, however, though followed, was doubted in Re Newman and Dale Steamship Co. and British and South American Steamship Co., [1903] 1 K. B. 262 (voyage charter), and was not followed in Braemount Steamship Co. v. Weir & Co. (1910), 15 Com. Cas. 101 (time charter), where it was held that a clause in the ordinary form was not mutual; compare Abbott on Shipping, 5th ed., p. 428; 14th ed., p. 867. SECT. 1. Charter-parties.

discharge, in consequence of the happening of an excepted event, is not to be counted, unless actually used (i). The extent of this protection may be limited by a proviso that no deduction of time is to be allowed if the ship is already on demurrage when the event happens (k), or if the charterer fails to give due notice of its happening to the master or shipowner (l). Where the event takes place at the port of loading and prevents the charterer from loading a cargo, the stipulation may provide that the charterparty is to become null and void, except as regards any cargo already shipped (m). The charterer is thus relieved from the obligation to supply any further cargo. Sometimes, however, a proviso is inserted that the charterparty is not to become null and void, if part of the cargo has already been put on board (n).

Construction.

215. Any stipulation relieving the charterer from responsibility being inserted for his benefit is to be construed against him (o), and the words used are to be taken in their obvious meaning (p). Where, however, the words are ambiguous, this meaning is to be gathered from the surrounding circumstances to which the charterparty was intended to apply (q). The burden of proving that the stipulation is operative in any particular case rests on the charterer (r). It is not sufficient to show that an excepted event happened, and as a matter of fact prevented the charterer from fulfilling his obligation in the way which he had chosen (s). He must go further and show either that the way he had chosen was the only practicable way of performing his obligation (t), and that it

Principal exceptions :

216. The principal exceptions which are inserted for the special protection of the charterer are the following (c), namely :—

(1) strikes and lock-outs ;

(1) Strikes and lock-outs (d). The phrase implies a labour dispute (e); it does not, therefore, cover the case where workmen abandon their work through fear of an epidemic (f), or where the employer dismisses them because he has no work for them (g). The exception may be limited to workmen essential to the loading or discharge of the cargo (h); it may extend to workmen connected with the supply of the cargo (i), or it may be framed in general a strike clause, and he is not bound to stop the ship or name another port (Bulman and Dickson v. Fenwick & Co., [1894] 1 Q. B. 179, C. (c) It is impossible to deal in detail with all exceptions that may be employed. Such exceptions as have been judicially considered are referred to in this sub-section, or in the sections dealing with the duties of the charterer which are modified by their insertion in the contract. For a strike clause intended to protect the shipowners, see Wiles & Co., Ltd. v. Ocean Steamship Co., Ltd. (1912), 107 L. T. 825. Certain clauses known as the "I. S. F. Strike Expenses Clauses" have been prepared by the International Shipping Federation; see Times, 8th December, 1913. These clauses, which are intended to be incorporated in charterparties and bills of lading, will, if adopted, confer extensive powers of dealing with the cargo on the shipowner in the event of a strike, and provide for the apportionment of any expenses incurred between the shipowner and the cargo owner.

Where the exception refers to a general strike, as, for instance, of lightermen, it is sufficient if there is a general strike amongst a particular class of lightermen, though other classes of lightermen do not strike, provided that the charterer is thereby prevented from fulfilling his contract (Aktieselskabet Shakespeare v. Ekman & Co. (1902), 18 T. (5) war.

(5) War. Where the outbreak of war renders the charterparty illegal (r) the charterer is discharged from the obligation of performing his contract (s).

Negligence.

A negligence clause is sometimes inserted exempting the charterer from responsibility for any negligence, default or error in judgment

A strike of workmen unconnected with the ship or cargo in any way is not within the exception, even though its ultimate effect is to delay the ship (Gardiner v. Macfarlane, M'Crindell & Co. (1893), 20 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 414; Granite City Steamship Co. v. Ireland & Son (1891), 19 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 124). If the delay is caused by a strike covered by the exception, it is immaterial that the strike has already ended before the arrival of the ship (Leonis Steamship Co. v. Rank, Ltd. (No. 2) (1908), 13 Com. Cas. 295, C. A., followed in Moor Line, Ltd. v. Distillers Co., [1912] S. C. 514); compare Gordon Steamship Co. v. Moxey, Savon & Co. (1913), 18 Com. Cas. 170.

(n) Another word used is "causes." In Hibernian SS. Co., Ltd. v. Suttons, Ltd. (1912), 47 I. L. T. 39 (default of a railway company to provide wagons was held to be within the words "or any cause beyond the personal control of the charterers." The phrase may also take the form "unavoidable accidents and hindrances" (Crawford and Rowat v. Wilson, Sons & Co. (1896), 1 Com. Cas. 277, C. A., where the phrase was held to apply to rebellion). Whatever its form, the phrase is usually placed at the end of a list of exceptions, and the ejusdem generis rule accordingly applies (Re Richardsons and Samuel (M.) & Co., [1898] 1 Q. B. 261, C. A.; SS. Knutsford, Ltd. v. Tillmans & Co., [1908] A. C. 406; Mudie v. Strick (1909), 14 Com. Cas. 135; Thorman v. Dowgate Steamship Co., [1910] 1 K. of trimmers or stevedores employed in loading or discharging the cargo (t).

Effect of cesser clause.

217. A charterparty usually contains a stipulation, known as a cesser clause, providing that the charterer's liability under the charterparty is to cease as soon as the cargo is shipped (a). Such a stipulation is valid (b), but its effect varies according to the language in which it is framed (c). Whatever form the stipulation may take, the exemption as regards future liabilities arising after the loading appears to be absolute (d). As regards antecedent liabilities, the cesser of liability depends upon the wording of the clause. The clause may expressly deal with such liabilities; it may provide that the liability in respect of them is to continue (e) or to cease, either absolutely (f), or conditionally upon their discharge (g) More usually there is no express reference to antecedent liabilities, and the extent of the exemption then depends upon the construction to be placed upon the particular stipulation employed (h). If it is clear from the words of the stipulation that all liabilities under the charterparty, antecedent as well as future, are to cease on loading, the exemption is equally absolute in the case of antecedent liabilities as in the case of future liabilities (i). If, on the other hand, the words used are open to a different interpretation, the charterer's liability as to antecedent breaches of the charterparty will cease only in so far as an equivalent is given to the shipowner (k) in the shape of a remedy available against the consignee (l). The cesser clause will, therefore,

(a) For examples, see Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. XIV., pp. 104, 117. The effect of the clause is to exempt the charterer from liability, whether he is an agent only, as is usually the case, or a principal (Bannister v. Breslauer (1867), L. R. 2 C. P. 497; Francesco v. Massey (1873), L. R. 8 Exch. 101). The fact that he is the consignee of the cargo makes no difference (Sanguinetti v. Pacific Steam Navigation Co. (1877), 2 Q. B. D. 238, C. A.), unless he is otherwise liable under the bill of lading (Gullischen v. Stewart Brothers (1884), 13 Q. B. D. 317, C. be construed as inapplicable to the particular breach complained of if the effect of a different construction would be to leave the shipowner unprotected in respect of that particular breach (m). To ascertain the extent of the protection conferred by a cesser clause, the lien clause which follows it (n) and which embodies the remedy given to the shipowner as the corollary of the charterer's release must be read with it, and the two clauses must, if possible, be taken as co-extensive (o). No liability is destroyed by the cesser clause, unless it is re-created in someone else by the lien clause (p). The construction of the cesser clause is, therefore, governed by the construction of the lien clause, and if that clause confers no lien on the shipowner in respect of the claim which is in question, the charterer's liability is not taken away by the cesser clause (q). Accordingly the cesser clause usually provides that it is not to take effect unless the cargo shipped is sufficient to satisfy the various liens which the shipowner may possess over the cargo (r).

Liens usually conferred.

218. The cesser clause is always followed by a lien clause, which expresses the consideration received by the shipowner in exchange for his release of the charterer (s). The liens usually conferred by the clause are for freight, advance freight, dead freight, demurrage, and general average (t), but other liens are sometimes included (a). Of these liens the lien for freight, strictly so called (b), and for general average exist at common law, and are specified in the clause merely to prevent any inference being drawn from their omission (c). There is, however, no lien at common law for advance freight (d), dead freight (e), or demurrage (f); any such lien must be created by special contract (g). The lien given for dead freight includes unliquidated damages for failing to supply a full cargo (h); and the lien for demurrage applies not only to demurrage in the technical sense of the word (i), but also to a claim for damages for detention (k), unless it is clear from the context that the word was intended to bear its technical meaning only (l). It is immaterial whether the claim for demurrage or damages, as the case may be, arises in connexion with the loading (m) or the discharge, unless the cesser clause plainly excludes antecedent liabilities from its operation (n).

It is otherwise as regards future liabilities (French v. Gerber (1876), 1 C. P. D. 737; affirmed (1877), 2 C. P. D. 247, C. A.).

Damages.

219. The charterparty usually contains a penalty clause, which is to come into operation in the event of either party failing to perform the contract (o). Under this clause a fixed sum may be made payable (p), which is to be regarded as liquidated damages (q); more usually the damages are unliquidated, but must not exceed the estimated amount of freight (r).

Arbitration etc. clauses.

220. Any other stipulations may be inserted in the charterparty which the parties think it convenient to insert. Thus, there may be stipulations relating to arbitration (s), average (t), insurance (u), brokerage and other commissions (a), and payment of dock dues (b). Of these the stipulations relating to brokerage and other commissions alone call for comment.

Brokerage clause.

221. Where a charterparty is negotiated through a broker (c), a stipulation is usually inserted providing for the payment to him of a commission (d). The rate of commission is usually 5 per cent., and it may be expressly made payable on the gross amount of freight and demurrage receivable under the charterparty (e). The stipulation may provide when the commission is to become due, as, a larger sum may be recovered as damages (Winter v. Trimmer (1762), 1 Wm. Bl. 395; Harrison v. Wright (1811), 13 East, 343).

(c) Where there is a managing owner (see p. 35, ante), it is his duty to procure employment for the ship, and he is not entitled, in the absence of a special contract, to retain commissions on the charterparties or freights procured by him or by brokers employed by him (Williamson v. Hine, [1891] 1 Ch. 390; Manners v. Raeburn and Verel (1884), 11 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 899; compare Benson v. Heathorn (1842), 1 Y. & C. Ch. Cas. 326; Miller v. Mackay (1864), 34 Beav. 295). As to secret commissions, see Brenan v. Preston (1854), 2 W. R. 138.

(d) See Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. XIV., pp. 99, 104, 110, 118. The stipulation appearing in the charterparty may be disregarded if inapplicable to the actual contract (Holl v. Pinsent (1821), 6 Moore (C. P.), 228).

for instance, on the signing of the charterparty (f), or the loading of the cargo (g), or the earning of the freight (h).

When commission payable.

In the absence of any such stipulation, the right of the broker to receive his commission depends upon the ordinary principles of agency (i). Thus, the loss of the ship or cargo, or the charterer's failure to supply a full cargo, whereby little or no freight is payable, does not affect the broker's right to have his commission calculated upon the full amount which might have become payable under the charterparty, since he has already earned his commission by procuring the charterparty (k). Similarly, he is entitled to commission if, though he does not himself actually complete the negotiations, the signing of the charterparty is directly (l) attributable to his intervention (m). If, on the other hand, the event upon which his commission was to become payable never takes place, he cannot, in the absence of any default on the part of his principal (n), claim any commission (o).

Reporting of ship.

The stipulation may also provide that the ship is to be reported by the broker at the custom-house on her return (p). In this case the broker is not entitled to any remuneration unless she in fact returns (q).

Services to ship.

222. Other stipulations may confer upon specified persons the right of performing services to the ship in return for a commission (r). Where the services include the procuring of a homeward cargo at the port of discharge (s) commission is payable, even though the homeward cargo is procured through other persons (t). The shipowner is not, however, bound under such a stipulation to take on board a homeward cargo at the port of discharge under the charterparty; and if he proceeds elsewhere and loads there, no commission is payable (a).

By whom commission payable.

223. The liability to pay commission is, by the terms of the charterparty, imposed, as a rule, upon the shipowner, even though the broker is in fact employed by the charterer (b). Except where the person to whom the commission is payable is himself a party to the contract, or where he has actually rendered services to the shipowner, he cannot sue the shipowner, but only his own principal, the charterer (c); and any action which may be brought against the shipowner must be brought by the charterer (d). The same principle applies where the charterer is not himself liable to pay commission, as, for instance, where the shipowner fails to employ the charterer's agent to procure a homeward cargo; the charterer may sue the shipowner for the full amount of the commission due, and will hold it, when received, as trustee for his agent (e).

SUB-SECT. 4.—The Construction of Charterparties.

Rules of construction:

224. A charterparty, like any other mercantile document (f), is to be construed so as to give effect, as far as possible, to the intention of the parties as expressed in the written contract (g). The rules of construction to be applied are the same as for any other written instrument (h), and may be shortly stated as follows, namely:—

(1) meaning of words used;

(1) The words used are to be understood in their plain, ordinary and popular meaning (i), unless the context shows that the parties, for the purposes of their contract, intended to place a different

(a) Cross v. Pagliano (1870), L. R. 6 Exch. 9.

(c) Barnetson v. Petersen Brothers (1902), 5 F. (Ct. of Sess.) 86; compare The Nuova Raffaelina (1871), L. R. 3 A. & E. 483.

(d) Robertson v. Wait (1853), 8 Exch. 299. The broker can sue the shipowner if he was employed by the shipowner (White v. Turnbull, Martin & Co. (1898), 3 Com. Cas. 183, C. A.). When the ship is consigned to the charterer's agents free of commissions, any commission which the shipowner is compelled to pay to such agents is recoverable from the charterer (Russell v. Griffith (1860), 2 F. & F. 118).

(f) As to the construction of contracts, generally, see title CONTRACT, Vol. VII., pp. 509 et seq., and of documents generally, see title DEEDS AND OTHER INSTRUMENTS, Vol. X., pp. 433 et seq. As the rules governing the construction of charterparties are equally applicable to the construction of bills of lading, cases relating to the construction of bills of lading are included in the present sub-section. It is not, however, necessary for the contract to be expressed in writing (Lidgett v. Williams (1845), 4 Hare, 456, 462).

(g) Constable v. Clovery (1626), Palm. 397. Where the charterparty contains no provision relating to the events that have happened, it is to be presumed that the parties intended to stipulate for that which is fair and reasonable, having regard to their mutual interests and to the main objects of the contract, and the meaning of the contract is to be taken to be that which the parties, as fair and reasonable men, would presumably have agreed upon if they had taken such events into consideration, and had made express provision to meet them (Dahl v. Nelson, Donkin & Co. (1881), 6 App. Cas. 38, per Lord WATSON, at p. 59).

meaning upon them (k), or unless, by the usage of some particular trade, business, or port (l), they have to such an extent acquired a secondary or technical meaning that it is clearly the meaning intended by the parties (m).

(2) reference to surrounding circumstances;

(2) The words used are to be construed with reference to the surrounding circumstances to which they were intended by the parties to apply (n).

(3) contra proferentem;

(3) Exceptions and stipulations inserted for the protection of one of the parties are, if capable of being construed as conferring either a wider or a narrower protection, to be construed most strongly against the party whom they were intended to protect (o). Thus, a stipulation that the shipowner is not to be liable for damage capable of being covered by insurance does not cover the theft of the goods (p), or damage attributable to negligence (q), or to the unseaworthiness of his ship (r).

(4) ejusdem generis;

(4) General words, if preceded by words of more specific application, are to be construed as limited to things ejusdem generis with those which have been specifically mentioned before (s). This rule does not, however, apply where the specific words cannot be reduced under one genus, and in this case general words will receive their full signification (t).

SECT. 1. Charter-parties.

(5) admission of parol evidence;

(5) Parol evidence is not admissible to vary the terms of the charterparty (u), but only to explain them if ambiguous (a) or used in a technical meaning (b), or to supplement them by proving an independent collateral undertaking (c). Since, however, it is well known that different trades and different ports have usages of their own which regulate the supply (d), loading (e), or discharging (f) of the cargo, or by which the extent of the duties (g), rights (h), or liabilities (i) of the parties are to be determined, the parties must be taken, in the absence of anything to show the contrary (k), to have contracted with reference to such usages, and to have intended to incorporate them in their contract (l). Parol evidence of such usages is, therefore, admissible for the purpose of supplementing the written terms of the charterparty (m), or, where the written terms are ambiguous or used in a technical meaning, for the purpose of explaining them and making clear the intention of the parties (n). Where, however, the usage is plainly inconsistent with

(6) functions of court and jury;

(6) The construction of the charterparty is a question for the court and not for the jury (r); but where parol evidence is admitted, the effect of the evidence is for the jury (s).

(7) conflict of laws.

(7) Where any question arises involving a conflict of laws, the law of the ship's flag prevails (a), unless it is clear from the express language of the charterparty (b), or otherwise (c), that the parties intended some other law to prevail.

Effect of writing and print.

225. Charterparties are, in practice, made out on printed forms, of a more or less standardised character; and contain blank spaces for the purpose of enabling the parties to adapt the form used to their particular contract by filling in the necessary details in writing (d). So far as possible, those terms of the charterparty which are in print (e) are to be treated as forming the contract

The same inference is to be drawn from the language and form of the bill of lading (Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands India Steam Navigation Co. (1883), 10 Q. B. D. 521, C. equally with those which are in writing (f). The printed terms are, however, the words of a common form, representing the usual terms of a charterparty, which are intended to suit each particular case as far as they can, but which are not introduced in contemplation of any particular case (g). On the other hand, the written terms embody the special stipulations which the parties, after consideration of all the circumstances, have introduced for the purpose of meeting their particular requirements (h). More weight, therefore, is to be given to the written than to the printed terms (i); if they conflict and cannot be reconciled, the written terms must be preferred, and the printed terms treated as though they had been struck out of the charterparty (k).

Additions and alterations.

The principles governing the effect of an addition, alteration, erasure, or obliteration after the completion of a written document (l) apply equally in the case of a charterparty (m). The charterparty is, therefore, not avoided when its stipulations are varied by subsequent agreement (n), but it may be otherwise if the variation is not assented to by both parties (o).

(ii.) Conditions Precedent.

Statements on face of charterparty.

226. All statements of fact, other than immaterial representations (p), and all undertakings as to the future contained in the stipulations of a charterparty, form part of the contract and bind the person from whom they proceed (q). If, therefore, the fact is untrue, or the undertaking is not fulfilled, such person is guilty of a breach of contract, which entitles the injured party to recover damages, and may also justify him in refusing to perform his own part of the contract, on the ground that the charterparty has been discharged by the breach (r).

Test of condition precedent.

227. A charterparty is not discharged by a breach of contract, unless the stipulation which has been broken is a condition precedent to the performance by the injured party of his own obligations (s). The question whether any particular stipulation is a condition precedent or not is one of construction, to be determined by the court (t) according to the fair intention of the parties (a). Where the stipulation is expressly called a condition precedent, or where the charterparty is expressly made null and void in the event of its non-performance, the intention of the parties to make the stipulation a condition precedent is clear. In any other case the circumstances in which, and the purposes for which, the charterparty was entered into must also be taken into consideration as indicating the intention of the parties (b); and there must be nothing, either in such circumstances or in the language of the stipulation (c), inconsistent with the conclusion that the parties intended the stipulation to be an essential (d) part of their contract (e). The non-performance of the stipulation must go to the root and consideration of the contract as a whole, and not merely to a part of it (f); it must be clear that the injured party never intended to bind himself to perform any part of his own obligations unless the obligations of the other party were duly performed (g). A stipulation of any other kind is to be regarded as an independent agreement, the breach of which entitles to damages only (h).

SECT. 1. Charter-parties.

Effect of subsequent events.

228. A stipulation which was not originally intended to be a condition cannot be turned into a condition by subsequent events (i). On the other hand, subsequent events may prevent the injured party from relying upon a stipulation as a condition precedent and thus claiming that he is discharged from his duty of performing his part of the contract; and in this case he is entitled to recover damages only (k). This takes place where the injured party waives his right to repudiate the contract (l), or where he has already received the whole or any substantial part of the consideration for his own promise (m).

SECT. 2.—Bills of Lading.

SUB-SECT. 1.—The Nature of a Bill of Lading.

Definition.

229. A bill of lading (a) is a document signed by the shipowner, or by the master, or other agent of the shipowner (b), which states that certain specified goods have been shipped upon a particular ship, and which purports to set out the terms on which such goods have been delivered to and received by the ship (c). After signature it is handed to the shipper, who may either retain it or transfer it to a third person (d). This person may be named in the bill of lading as the person to whom delivery of the goods is to be made on arrival at their destination, in which case he is known as the consignee (e); if he is not named in the bill of lading, he is usually known as the holder or indorsee of the bill of lading (f). The effect of a bill of lading depends partly upon the position of the person in whose hands it is, and partly upon the circumstances of the particular case.

Acknowledgement of receipt.

230. A bill of lading is, in the first instance, an acknowledgment of the receipt of the goods specified therein (g). Except as adventure, the charterer is excused (Tarrabochia v. Hickie (1856), 1 H. & N. 183).

(e) The insertion of a name in the bill of lading does not, however, bind the shipper; he may, therefore, revoke the consignment to the named consignee at any time until such consignee has received the bill of lading or the goods (Mitchel v. Ede (1840), 11 Ad. & El. 888). The shipper must, however, recall the bill of lading already issued, or indemnify the master against any liability thereunder (Davidson v. Gwynne, supra; Tindall v. Taylor (1854), 4 E. & B. 219).

against the person actually signing it (h), it is not conclusive, and may be controverted by evidence showing that the goods were never in fact received (i). A shipowner, therefore, who has not signed the bill of lading is not necessarily bound by the acknowledgment of receipt signed by his agent (k). The agent has no authority to sign a bill of lading either for goods which have not been shipped (l), or for a greater quantity of goods than has actually been put on board (m); and this limitation upon his authority must be taken to be known to all persons to whose hands a bill of lading may come (n). The shipowner, therefore, is not estopped by the signature of his agent (o) from proving either that the goods stated in the bill of lading to have been shipped were not shipped (p), or that the quantities specified in the bill of lading are incorrect, and that he has delivered all the goods which were in fact put on board (q). Nevertheless, it is not to be presumed that the agent in signing the bill of lading was acting in excess of his authority, and the burden of falsifying the bill of lading rests on the shipowner (r).

When conclusive.

The bill of lading may, however, by an express stipulation be made conclusive evidence of the quantity shipped (s). In this case the shipowner is bound, in the absence of fraud, by the statement in the bill of lading, and cannot escape liability by showing that the goods specified or some portion of them had not been shipped (t), or even that they had been lost before shipment by an excepted peril (a). The cause of the misstatement is immaterial; it may be a pure miscalculation (b), or it may be a mistaken belief that in the circumstances the goods had to be signed for, though not put on board (c). If there is a miscalculation the shipowner cannot, where there are two or more classes of goods concerned, escape liability for delivering less than the specified quantity of one class of goods by showing that he has delivered more than the specified quantity of another class, since as against him both quantities are equally conclusive (d). Where, however, words are inserted qualifying the statement as to quantity (e), or where the charter-party contains an inconsistent condition which is incorporated in the bill of lading (f), the bill of lading is no longer to be regarded as conclusive evidence of the quantity shipped, and the shipowner, in spite of the stipulation, is not precluded from showing that the whole or part of the goods specified was not shipped.

Document of title.

231. The bill of lading is a symbol of the right of property in the goods specified therein (g). Its possession is equivalent to the possession of the goods themselves (h), and its transfer, being a symbolical delivery of the goods (i), has by mercantile usage (k) the same effect as an actual delivery in the same circumstances (l).

On a transfer, therefore, of a bill of lading by way of sale (m), mortgage or pledge (n), the property in the goods passes either absolutely or otherwise, according to the intention of the parties, to the transferee, provided that the transferor was competent to dispose of the goods (o); and the right of the original owner of the goods to stop them in transit is wholly or partially defeated (p). Since, however, a bill of lading is not in the full sense of the word (q) a negotiable instrument, the title of the transferor to the bill of lading and his competency to dispose of the goods specified therein are important elements to be taken into consideration (r).

As regards the shipowner the bill of lading is a document of title, entitling its holder on production to delivery of the goods (s). A delivery, therefore, to the holder of the bill of lading, even where he is not in fact entitled to the goods, discharges the shipowner, provided that it is made in good faith without notice of any defect in the holder's title (t). On the other hand the shipowner is not discharged, however bonâ fide his act may be, by delivery to the wrong person without production of the bill of lading (a).

232. The contract of carriage need not necessarily be expressed in a charterparty. In the absence of a charterparty (b) the terms upon which the parties have agreed may be ascertained by reference not only to documents of a more or less informal character, such as berth notes (c), advice notes (d), freight notes (e), or mate's receipts (f), but also to advertisements (g), and even to conversations (h), and the general course of business followed on previous occasions by the parties (i). Where, however, as is usually the case, there is a bill of lading relating to the goods, the terms of the contract on which the goods are carried are to be ascertained from the bill of lading (k). In some cases the bill of lading is to be regarded as evidence only of a pre-existing contract (l), and the person accepting it is not necessarily bound by all its stipulations (m), but may be entitled to repudiate them on the ground that, as he did not know, and could not reasonably be expected to know, of their existence, his assent to them is not to be inferred from his acceptance of the bill of lading without objection (n). The bill of lading, however, as between the shipowner and an indorsee constitutes the contract (o), and it may also constitute the contract as between the shipowner and the shipper (p). Though the contract of carriage will generally be made before the goods are sent to the ship, the contract may afterwards be reduced into writing and expressed in the bill of lading (q).

Where there is a charterparty.

Where there is a charterparty the bill of lading is, nevertheless, as between the shipowner and an indorsee, the contract on which the goods are carried (r). As between the shipowner and the charterer it may in some cases have the effect of modifying the contract as contained in the charterparty (s), though in general the charterparty will prevail, and the bill of lading will operate solely as an acknowledgment of receipt (t).

Through bills of lading.

233. Where the goods have to be carried for a portion of the journey by land (u) upon a conveyance belonging to some person other than the shipowner (a), it is the practice for the shipowner or other person with whom the contract of carriage is made in the first instance to charge an inclusive rate for the sea voyage and the land transit, and to issue to the shipper what is called a through bill of lading. This through bill of lading usually incorporates by reference the regular form of bill of lading used by the shipowner (b), which thus becomes a part of the contract (c), except in so far as its terms are inconsistent with the express terms of the through bill of lading (d). Unless the through bill of lading states the contrary (e), the contract is to be regarded as made solely with the shipowner or other person who issues it (f), and he alone exercises the rights and incurs the liabilities arising out of the various stages of the transit (g). If the contract of the shipowner provides that his liability as such is to cease at a particular place, it is, nevertheless, his duty to contract on behalf of the shipper for the forwarding of the goods to their destination (h).

Freight etc.

As a general rule, therefore, the whole of the inclusive freight is payable to the shipowner issuing the through bill of lading (i). If it is payable in advance, he may retain the whole, notwithstanding that some portion of it can never be earned by reason of the loss of the goods before some of the stages of the journey have been begun (j). Similarly, where the land transit precedes the sea voyage and the bill of lading gives the shipowner a lien for his charges of the land transit (k), the shipowner may, on a portion of the goods being lost during the voyage, exercise the lien for the full amount of such charges over the remainder of the goods, although he would not be entitled to do so in respect of the full amount of his own freight in the strict sense of the word (l). If an overcharge has been made in respect of the land transit, the shipowner is responsible for its repayment, and cannot require the shipper to recover it from the land carrier (m).

SUB-SECT. 2.—The Form of a Bill of Lading.

234. A bill of lading is usually expressed in a printed document (n), containing blank spaces for the insertion of the necessary details (o). It states that certain goods, which are specified in the margin (p), have been shipped in good order and condition (q) by the shipper in and upon a certain ship (r) then lying in the port of loading and bound for a particular port, and are to be delivered in like good order and condition (s) at their destination to, or to the order of, a specified person or his assigns, or to bearer (t), upon payment of freight (a). Under the usual form the ship is given liberty to deviate (b), certain perils are excepted (c), and there is a negligence clause (d). The charterparty, if any, is usually incorporated to a greater or less extent (e), and provision is made for the payment of general average (f). In some cases the bill of lading contains a large number of stipulations, which deal fully with the respective rights and duties of the parties (g).

The bill of lading is not invalidated as a negotiable instrument by the details as to the goods being filled in by the shipper after the master has signed (Cowdenbeath Coal Co. v. Clydesdale Bank (1895), 22 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 682). Any loss occasioned by a misdescription falls on the consignee (Shirwell v. Shaplock (1815) 2 Chit. 397).

A bill of lading is usually drawn in a set of three numbered consecutively (h), and it is stipulated that, any one of the three being accomplished, the others are to be void (i). The bill of lading is dated and signed by the master or other agent of the shipowner (k). If the signature is unqualified, the bill of lading is known as a clean bill of lading (l); in practice, however, the signature is usually qualified by the insertion of a statement that the weight, quality, quantity, or contents are unknown (m).

Stamps.

235. A bill of lading of or for any goods, merchandise, or effects to be exported or carried coastwise requires a 6*d.* stamp (n). A bill of lading made abroad, though relating to goods to be imported into the United Kingdom, need not be stamped (o).

A bill of lading which requires to be stamped cannot be stamped after execution, and every person making or executing a bill of lading not duly stamped is liable to a fine of £50 (p).

Mate's receipt.

236. When the goods are delivered to the ship (q) the shipper is usually handed a written acknowledgment of their receipt on behalf of the ship (r). This acknowledgment is called the mate's receipt, and it is primâ facie evidence that the goods specified therein have been delivered to and received by the ship (s). It is not, however, conclusive evidence, though the burden of proving that it is incorrect lies on the shipowner (t). Qualifying words may be inserted describing the condition of the goods at the time of shipment; in the absence of any qualification the receipt is known as a clean receipt (a).

Right to receive bill of lading.

237. The person who at the time of shipment is the owner of the goods is entitled to receive a bill of lading (b), and to have it made out in accordance with his legitimate instructions (c). If he is refused a bill of lading, or if the terms of the bill of lading offered differ from those which he is entitled to require (d), or if his instructions are not complied with (e), he may demand the redelivery of his goods (f), and a refusal to redeliver them, when so demanded (g), amounts to a conversion of them by the shipowner (h). The shipowner is not discharged from his responsibility to the owner of the goods merely on the ground that a bill of lading has already been signed and handed over to a third person who was bonâ fide believed to be the owner (i).

Bills in a set.

238. Where the bill of lading is issued in a set, as, for instance, where it is made out in triplicate, it is the practice for the master to retain one part for his own use and to deliver the remaining parts to the shipper (k).

Effect of mate's receipt.

239. Possession of the mate's receipt is primâ facie evidence of ownership (l), entitling the holder to receive a bill of lading (m). On its production, therefore, the master or other agent of the shipowner is, in the absence of notice that the holder is not the owner, justified in signing a bill of lading and delivering it to the holder in exchange for the mate's receipt (n). He is not, however, bound to insist on its production (o), and may sign the bill of lading without requiring the mate's receipt to be returned or accounted for (p). In this case it is his duty to satisfy himself that the goods for which he signs are actually on board the ship, and that the person to whom he delivers the bill of lading is their owner or was their owner at the time of shipment (q). If, therefore, the bill of lading is delivered to the wrong person, and no mate's receipt is asked for, the shipowner remains responsible to the owner (r).

D. 115, C. A.), though it might have been otherwise if the owner had demanded the redelivery of his goods (ibid., per COCKBURN, C.J., at p. 120; compare Ralli v. Paddington Steamship Co. (1900), 5 Com. Cas. 124).

Transfer.

A transfer of the mate's receipt does not, of itself, pass the property in the goods specified therein (s), and the holder, therefore, cannot, as against the true owner, claim the bill of lading or the goods themselves (t). On the other hand, a transfer of the goods with the intention of passing the property in them to the transferee entitles the transferee, as against the transferor, to receive the bill of lading, notwithstanding that the mate's receipt is not transferred but is retained by the original owner (a).

Where there is no bill of lading.

Where there is no bill of lading, and the mate's receipt mentions a consignee to whom it is intended that the property shall pass, delivery of the goods on arrival at their destination must be made to such consignee, and not to the original shipper (b).

SUB-SECT. 4.—The Signature of the Bill of Lading.

By whom signed.

240. The bill of lading is usually signed, not by the shipowner personally, but by the master or other agent acting on the shipowner's behalf (c). The person who actually signs a bill of lading is always liable upon it (d); if, therefore, the shipowner signs it himself (e), no difficulty arises. Where, however, the signature is that of an agent, the shipowner's liability depends upon the extent of the agent's authority, and the general principles of agency apply (f).

Effect of master's signature.

241. The shipowner is bound by his master's signature to a bill of lading, provided that the master, in signing the bill of lading, did not exceed his authority (g). Where the bill of lading in question is one which the master was expressly authorised to sign, the shipowner's liability is clear (h). His liability does not, however, depend upon the existence of an express authority; he is equally liable where the master is acting within the scope of his apparent authority as such (i). All persons taking a bill of lading are entitled to presume that the master who signed it possessed the authority usual in the line of business in which he was employed (k). Where, therefore, the bill of lading as signed falls within the usual authority of a master, the shipowner cannot repudiate liability merely on the ground that he had limited the authority of the particular master, and that the bill of lading in consequence did not fall within the master's express authority (l). No limitation in derogation of the usual authority is binding, except as against persons who are or ought to have been aware of it (m). To exempt the shipowner from liability he must show that the limitation of authority has been brought to the knowledge, or was within the means of knowledge, of the person claiming under the bill of lading (n). On the other hand, the nature and limitation of a master's authority are well known amongst mercantile persons (o). Where, therefore, the bill of lading falls outside the usual authority of a master, the master, in signing it, exceeds his apparent authority, and his signature imposes no liability on the shipowner (p), unless, in the particular circumstances, his express authority extends thus far (q).

SECT. 2. Bills of Lading.

Under his apparent authority the master may bind the shipowner by statements in the bill of lading relating to the amount of freight to be paid by the consignee (r), or to the condition of his goods (s), or to the time allowed for discharging the cargo (t).

The master has no apparent authority to bind the shipowner by signing a bill of lading for goods which have never been shipped (a), or for which he has already given a different bill of lading (b); nor does he bind the shipowner by statements in the bill of lading that no freight is to be payable (c), or that the freight is to be paid to a third person (d), or by statements relating to the quantity (e) or quality (f) of the goods actually received.

Limits on authority.

242. Where the master has exceeded his authority in signing the bill of lading, and the shipowner in consequence successfully repudiates liability, the master, if he signed the bill of lading as agent only (g), will be liable for breach of warranty of authority (h), or, if he made himself a party to the contract, he will be liable upon the bill of lading (i). In particular, it is provided by statute that a bill of lading in the hands of a consignee or indorsee for valuable consideration, representing goods to have been shipped, is to be conclusive evidence of shipment as against the master or other person signing it (k), notwithstanding that such goods or some part thereof may not have been shipped (l), unless the holder of the bill of lading had, at the time when he became holder, actual notice that the goods had not in fact been put on board (m). (l) The fact that the bill of lading specifies a particular identification mark does not preclude the defendant from showing that the identification mark was incorrect, and that the goods which he has tendered, though differently marked, were the goods shipped under the bill of lading (Parsons v. New Zealand Shipping Co., [1901] 1 K. SECT. 2. Bills of Lading.

or other person signing the bill of lading may, however, exonerate himself in respect of any misrepresentation contained in the bill of lading by showing that it was caused without any default on his part (n), and wholly by the fraud of the shipper, or of the holder, or some person through whom the holder claims (o). It is, therefore, the practice of the master or person signing the bill of lading to qualify the statements as to the goods inserted in the bill of lading by adding some such phrase as "weight, quality, quantity and contents unknown" (p). Although by signing the bill of lading he admits that certain goods have been received by the ship, the effect of the qualification is that he declines to accept the particulars furnished him by the shipper as correct (q). He is not, therefore, bound by any statement in the bill of lading with reference to matters specifically excluded by the qualification (r). At the same time he must deliver the goods which he has actually received, whatever they may be (s). Unless, however, the qualification expressly refers to the condition of the goods, the statement that the goods have been shipped in good order and condition is binding as against both the master and the shipowner (t), as being an admission that the goods were externally to all appearance in good order and condition at the time of shipment (a). If, therefore, the goods on delivery appear to be damaged externally, the shipowner is liable on the admission (b), unless he can prove that the goods were in fact damaged by a cause for which he is not responsible (c). If, however, the damage is internal, the shipper must prove that

243. A bill of lading, as being a document of title (g), has always, by the custom of merchants (h), been regarded as transferable (i), unless transfer is precluded by the form in which it is drawn (k). It does not appear to be transferable where it requires the goods specified therein to be delivered to a named person, omitting any reference to his order or assigns (l). The further transfer of a bill of lading transferable in origin may be restricted (m) or prohibited by the form in which it is indorsed (n).

(d) Where the damage may arise either from the bad condition of the goods when shipped, or from some cause existing in the ship, it may be essential to prove the state of the goods before shipment, as where a cargo of grain is found to be heated; but where noxious substances calculated to produce the peculiar damage actually present are found in close proximity to the goods, cause and effect are so closely brought together that a conclusion can be reached without proof of their condition at the time of shipment (Moore v. Harris (1876), 1 App. Cas. 318, 326, P. C., where tea in packages was tainted by a disinfectant, and such disinfectant had been used on board). Similarly the arrival of the ship without the goods is primâ facie evidence against the shipowner (Wilson, Sons & Co. v. The "Xantho" (Owners of Cargo) (1887), 12 App. Cas. 503), although there is no evidence to show how the goods were lost (Baxter's Leather Co. v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Co., [1908] 2 K. B. 626, C. A.), but it is otherwise if the ship herself fails to arrive (Boyson v. Wilson (1816), 1 Stark. 236).

be transferred to different persons so as to constitute each of them a holder of the bill of lading (p). There is only one bill of lading, though represented by different parts; a transfer of any one part, if intended to operate as such (q), is a transfer of the bill of lading (r), and the subsequent transfer of any other part is inoperative (s).

245. A bill of lading which contains the name of the consignee, and further provides for delivery to his order or to his assigns, is transferred by indorsement and delivery (t). Such indorsement may name the transferee to whom delivery is to be made, in which case it is called a special indorsement (a). If no transferee is named the indorsement is called an indorsement in blank (b), and the goods specified in the bill of lading are deliverable to bearer (c).

If the bill of lading does not name the consignee, but makes the goods deliverable to bearer, or to order or assigns, the space for the name of the consignee being left blank, it may be transferred by delivery without indorsement (d).

Under a special indorsement the indorsee may, if the form of the indorsement so permits, transfer the bill of lading by indorsement and delivery to a subsequent indorsee (e). If the bill of lading is indorsed in blank, it is transferable by mere delivery (f). The holder may, however, at any time convert the indorsement in blank into a special indorsement by inserting in the indorsement the name of the person to whom delivery is to be made (g); and he may also specially indorse a bill of lading to bearer (h), or insert the name of a consignee in the space on the face of the bill of lading, if left blank (i). In these cases the bill of lading ceases to be transferable by mere delivery, and requires indorsement by the consignee whose name is inserted or by the indorsee named in the special indorsement, as the case may be, before it is capable of being further transferred (k).

Transfer to agent.

246. A bill of lading may be transferred to an agent merely for purposes of convenience, to enable him to deal with the goods specified therein on behalf of the owner, as, for instance, where he is authorised to take delivery of them (l), or to stop them in transit (m). In this case no property in the goods passes to the agent, as holder of the bill of lading, by reason of the transfer of the bill of lading, since the transfer is not intended to have that effect (n). The agent cannot, therefore, as a general rule, by a further transfer of the bill of lading, divest his principal of his property in the goods (o). Where, however, the agent has authority, express (p) or implied (q), to deal with the bill of lading so as to pass the property in the goods, a transfer of the bill of lading by him in accordance with his authority will be equivalent to a transfer by the principal himself, and will pass the property to the transferee (r).

When equivalent to transfer of goods.

247. A transfer of the bill of lading may, however, be intended to operate as a transfer of the goods specified therein (s). In this case such property passes to the transferee as is intended by the parties to pass (t). Whether the transfer is intended to pass the whole property or only a qualified property is a question of fact depending upon the circumstances of each particular case (a).

The whole property in the goods does not pass unless the transfer of the bill of lading was intended to have that effect (b).

Where the intention to pass the whole property is clear, as where the goods are sold while at sea, the transfer of the bill of lading to the buyer divests the seller of all property in the goods and constitutes the buyer owner (c). The seller, if unpaid, will, however, retain his right to stop the goods in transit (d); but this right will be defeated by a resale of the goods by the buyer (e), accompanied by a transfer of the bill of lading to the new buyer (f), or by the buyer taking delivery of the goods under the bill of lading (g).

Protection of seller:

248. For his better protection the seller may adopt one or other of the following courses, namely:—

(1) By reserving right of disposal;

(1) The seller may reserve the right of disposal (h) by taking a bill of lading under which the goods are deliverable to himself or to his agent (i). This bill of lading is not transferred to the buyer, but retained until the price is paid, and therefore the property in the goods remains in the seller (k). If, however, the agent to whom the bill of lading has been forwarded, with instructions not to hand it over to the buyer without first receiving payment, in fact hands it over without receiving payment, the transfer passes the property to the buyer; and a further transfer, therefore, from the buyer to a person who takes the bill of lading bonâ fide without notice and for value defeats the seller's rights and passes the property to the second transferee, notwithstanding that the bill of lading was obtained from the seller's agent by the buyer's fraud (l).

(2) by drawing for the price;

(2) The seller may tender (m) to the buyer a bill of lading duly transfer of the bill of lading, if such is the intention of the parties (Meyer v. Sharpe (1813), 5 Taunt. 74; Nathan v. Giles (1814), 5 Taunt. 558; Joyce v. Swann (1864), 17 C. B. (N. S.) 84; compare Dick v. Lumsden (1793), Peake, 250 [189]).

(e) Jenkyns v. Usborne (1844), 7 Man. & G. 678; Pease v. Gloahec, The "Marie Joseph," supra. But the original buyer in his turn may stop the goods as against the new buyer (Patten v. Thompson (1816), 5 M. & S. 350).

(g) Coxe v. Harden (1803), 4 East, 211. A stoppage in transitu after a portion of the goods has been delivered is effectual as regards the balance (Re McLaren, Ex parte Cooper (1879), 11 Ch. D. 68, C. A.).

(where the property was held to pass on a tender of the price). But if the intention to pass the property at the time of shipment is otherwise clear, the fact that the bill of lading is taken in the seller's name may be disregarded (Joyce v. Swann, supra).

indorsed (n), accompanied by a bill of exchange for the price drawn upon the buyer (o). In this case the indorsement of the bill of lading to the buyer is to be regarded as conditional only (p), and the property in the goods does not pass to the buyer unless he accepts the bill of exchange (q). He cannot, therefore, keep the bill of lading (r), or claim delivery of the goods as against the seller (s), without accepting the bill of exchange (t). If, however, he retains possession of the bill of lading, its transfer to a person who takes it bonâ fide and for value gives the transferee a good title to the goods as against the true owner, notwithstanding the buyer's failure to accept the bill of exchange (a).

(1883), 11 Q. B .D. 327, C. A.). The tender must be made with due diligence, but need not be in time to enable it to be forwarded to the destination of the goods before the arrival of the ship (ibid., per BRETT, M.R., at p. 336). Nor must the tender be delayed till the ship has arrived (E. Clemens Horst & Co. v. Biddell Brothers, [1912] A. C. 18).

(n) As to what documents are to be tendered, see Landauer & Co. v. Craven and Speeding Brothers, [1912] 2 K. B. 94. The acceptance of the bill of exchange on the faith of a letter advising the consignee of a consignment of goods is not equivalent to the indorsement of the bill of lading (Nichols v. Clent (1817), 3 Price, 547).

(o) When the bill of lading includes other goods, the buyer may by his conduct estop himself from refusing to accept the bill of exchange on the ground that the other goods have been included (Imperial Ottoman Bank v. Cowan (1874), 31 L. T. 336, Ex. Ch.).

(p) It is not necessary for the seller to give express notice that the indorsement is conditional (Shepherd v. Harrison (1871), L. R. 5 H. L. 116). But the indorsement is not to be regarded as conditional if the consignee is, as between the consignor and himself, under no duty to accept the bill of exchange (Ogle v. Atkinson (1814), 5 Taunt. 759 ; Depperman v. Hubbersty (1852), 17 Q. B. 766 ; Key v. Cotesworth (1852), 7 Exch. 595).

Until acceptance the property remains in the seller, even though the buyer has promised to accept the bill of exchange and his promise has been acted upon (Hoare v. Dresser (1859), 7 H. L. Cas. 290). The property passes on the acceptance, notwithstanding that the bill of exchange is never honoured (Re Tappenbeck, Ex parte Banner (1876), 2 Ch. D. 278, C. A.), unless there is a special stipulation that the bill of exchange is to be paid (Barrow v. Coles (1811), 3 Camp. 92). If the bill of lading is not handed over to the buyer after acceptance of the bill of exchange he may bring an action for its wrongful detention (Hoare v. Dresser, supra ; Lutscher v. Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris (1876), 1 Q. (t) Notwithstanding a refusal to accept the bill of exchange, he becomes entitled to the goods if he afterwards tenders the price (Mirabita v. Imperial Ottoman Bank (1878), 3 Ex. D. 164, C. A.).

But a sale of the goods without a transfer of the bill of lading is not sufficient (Sheridan v. New Quay Co., supra). The holder of the bill of exchange has no lien over the cargo in the absence of a specific appropriation of the cargo to meet the bill; a direction in the bill of exchange

(3) by indorsing to bank.

(3) The seller may draw a bill of exchange for the price upon the buyer and discount it with a banker, at the same time indorsing the bill of lading to the banker as security (b). In this case the buyer is not entitled to the bill of lading, and the property in the goods does not pass to him, until he has repaid (c) or tendered (d) to the banker the amount due under the bill of exchange (e).

Mortgage and pledge.

249. Where the transfer of the bill of lading is intended to pass only a qualified property in the goods specified in the bill of lading, it may operate either by way of mortgage or by way of pledge (f). The question whether the transaction is to be regarded as a mortgage or as a pledge depends upon whether the parties intended to transfer to the transferee the legal interest or only the equitable interest in the goods (g). Where the bill of lading is indorsed in blank and deposited as security for an advance, the transaction is a pledge (h). The pledgor is not divested of all his interest in the goods (i); but the pledgee is entitled to claim delivery of them (k), and, if necessary, to sell them in order to realise his security (l).

to charge it to the account of the cargo as advised, accompanied by a letter of advice, is not sufficient to create a lien (Brown, Shipley & Co. v. Kough (1885), 29 Ch. D. 848, C. The right of an unpaid seller to stop the goods in transit is not defeated by a transfer of the bill of lading by way of mortgage or pledge, but it can only be exercised subject to the rights of the mortgagee or pledgee (m).

Transfers passing no property.

250. A transfer of the bill of lading, though purporting to pass the property in the goods, in fact passes no property in them to the transferee in the following cases, namely:—

(1) Where the transfer is made without consideration (n). To be valid, the transfer must be made for valuable consideration (o). A past consideration is, however, sufficient (p).

(2) Where the transfer is made to a transferee who, being aware of circumstances making the transfer inoperative, such as, for instance, the insolvency of the buyer through whom he claims (q), or a breach of faith on the part of the transferor (r), cannot, therefore, be regarded as a bonâ fide holder (s). It is not sufficient to show that the transferee knows that the goods specified in the bill of lading have not been paid for (t). Moreover, a transfer of the bill of lading to a transferee who takes it bonâ fide without notice and for value is valid, even though the transferor obtained it by fraud (a).

(3) Where the transferor has himself no property in the goods (b), and has no authority to deal with the property in them (c). A person who has already sold the goods apart from the bill of lading cannot afterwards, by dealing with the bill of lading, transfer any property in them to the transferee (d). Similarly, where one part of a bill of lading drawn in a set has already been transferred with the intention of passing the property in the goods, the transferor has divested himself of all property in them, and the subsequent transfer of another part to another person does not pass any property to him (e).

Bills of Lading Act, 1855.

251. Where the bill of lading is delivered to the consignee named therein, or is transferred by indorsement to an indorsee, with the intention of passing the property in the goods specified therein (f), the rights and liabilities under the contract contained in the bill of lading are, by statute, transferred to the consignee or indorsee as if such contract had been made with himself (g). He is therefore entitled, on presenting the bill of lading, to claim delivery of the goods (h), and the shipowner cannot escape liability for their non-delivery (i) unless he succeeds in proving either that the goods were never in fact shipped (k), or that the non-delivery was occasioned by some excepted peril (l). The consignee or indorsee must in his turn take delivery of the goods (m) and pay the freight reserved by the bill of lading (n), the shipowner being entitled to withhold delivery until such freight (o) has been paid or tendered, or until any other lien existing at common law or created by the bill of lading has been discharged (p). Any demurrage due under a stipulation in the bill of lading must be paid by the consignee or indorsee (q); and, in the absence of any such stipulation, he will be liable to pay damages for detention if the ship is detained beyond a reasonable time by reason of his failure to take delivery of the goods (r).

If the goods are delivered in a damaged condition, the shipowner is liable to the consignee or indorsee for all damage sustained by the goods while in his custody (s), unless such damage is occasioned by some inherent defect in the goods themselves or by some excepted peril (t). He may also be liable for damage sustained by the goods before shipment, if the bill of lading states, without any qualification, that they were shipped in good order and condition, and the damage was at the time of shipment apparent (a).

Excess of authority.

252. A bill of lading which, as issued, falls outside the usual authority of the agent who signed it cannot be enforced against the shipowner by the consignee or indorsee (b), and recourse must be had to the agent (c). If, however, the bill of lading is covered by the authority which it is usual for such an agent to have, his signature binds his principal, and it is immaterial that he in fact exceeded his actual authority in signing the bill of lading (d), provided that the assignee or indorsee had no notice that the agent's authority had been limited (e).

Liability of indorsee.

253. An indorsee to whom a bill of lading has been indorsed by way of pledge has the right to claim delivery of the goods (f), but, until he exercises this right and takes delivery, he is not liable to the shipowner under the contract contained in the bill of lading (g). An indorsee of the bill of lading by way of mortgage is probably in the same position as a pledgee, and, in spite of his legal ownership, is not liable until he claims to take delivery of the goods (h).

Effect of indorsement.

254. The indorsement of the bill of lading does not deprive the shipowner of his right to claim the freight from the original shipper or owner of the goods (i). On the other hand, a consignee or indorsee who indorses the bill of lading to a third person with the intention of passing the property in the goods to him (k) ceases to be liable on the contract contained in the bill of lading (l). A sale of the goods, however, unaccompanied by an indorsement of the bill of lading, does not affect the position of the assignee or indorsee, and in spite of the passing of the property in the goods he remains the proper person to sue (m) and to be sued (n) upon the bill of lading.

Liability apart from statute.

255. Any liability of the consignee or indorsee which arises by reason or in consequence of his being the consignee or indorsee, or of his receipt of the goods by reason or in consequence of the consignment or indorsement to himself, is not prejudiced or affected by the provisions of the statute (o). If, therefore, the receipt of the goods would otherwise amount to a conversion, he is not exempt from liability on the ground that he received them under the bill of lading without knowledge of the circumstances (p). Apart from this exception, liabilities not arising out of the contract as contained in the bill of lading do not pass to him merely by virtue of the consignment or indorsement (q). He is not, therefore, bound by any terms of the original contract of carriage between the shipper and the shipowner, except in so far as they are incorporated in the bill of lading (r), and it is not sufficient to show that he was acquainted with such terms (s). On the other hand, the right of the buyer of goods to enforce the contract contained in the bill of lading against the shipowner, where it differs from the original contract of carriage, may be modified by the buyer's knowledge of such contract and he may therefore be precluded from enforcing any terms in the bill of lading which are to his knowledge repugnant to the terms of his own contract (t).

How far a negotiable instrument.

256. Though a bill of lading has frequently been described as a negotiable instrument (u), it is not in the strict sense of the words a negotiable instrument (x). In some respects it resembles a negotiable instrument, the principal points of resemblance being the following, namely :—

(1) The contract contained in the instrument is transferred by the delivery, with or without indorsement, as the case may be, of the instrument, no distinct contract of assignment being necessary (a).

(2) No notice of the transfer need be given to the person liable under the instrument (b).

(3) The transferee may, in some cases, acquire by virtue of the transfer greater rights than those of the transferor (c).

(4) The transferee may sue and be sued in his own name (d).

(5) The transferee, even though his title is defective, may give a good discharge to the person liable under the instrument (e).

(6) The consideration may be a past consideration (f).

The shipowner is discharged from his liability under the contract of carriage by delivering the goods to the first person who presents a bill of lading to him, even though such person is not in fact entitled to them, provided that the shipowner at the time of the delivery has no notice of any conflicting claims and no reason to suspect the truth (g).

(x) Gurney v. Behrend (1854), 3 E. & B. 622. It may be noted that the special verdict in Lickbarrow v. Mason (1793), 5 Term Rep. 683; 1 Smith, L. C., 11th ed., p. 693, describes bills of lading to order or assigns as negotiable and transferable by indorsement and delivery, but does not call them negotiable instruments. Moreover, Lord TENTERDEN, in discussing the transfer of bills of lading (Abbott on Shipping, 5th ed., pp. 383 et seq.; 14th ed., p. 843), uses the words " assignment " and " assignable."

SECT. 2. Bills of Lading.

Nevertheless, the effect of the transfer of a bill of lading depends upon the title of the person who makes the transfer (h), and consequently a bill of lading is not, in the full sense of the words, a negotiable instrument (i).

Limit to operation of transfer.

Its transfer, being only the transfer of a symbol, has no greater operation than the transfer of the goods which it represents (k). If, therefore, the transferor has no title to the goods, and no authority to deal with them on behalf of the true owner (l), the transferee, even though taking the bill of lading bonâ fide and for valuable consideration, acquires no rights against the true owner (m). Even if the bill of lading has been indorsed in blank by the shipper, its appropriation without his authority does not affect his rights (n); and if it is stolen from him or transferred without his authority, a subsequent bonâ fide transferee for value cannot make title under it as against him (o).

Bill of lading in general ship.

257. If the ship on which the goods specified in the bill of lading are carried is not working under a charterparty, but is employed solely for the benefit of the shipowner himself, the position of the shipowner is clear. His rights and liabilities depend, as regards the shipper, on the original contract of carriage (p), the best evidence of which is to be found in the bill of lading (q), and, as regards the consignee or indorsee of the bill of lading, on the contract contained in the bill of lading (r). He is not, however, bound as regards either the shipper or the consignee or indorsee, where the agent who signed the bill of lading exceeded his apparent authority in so doing (s). The existence of a charterparty may, however, materially affect the position of the shipowner. It is necessary, therefore, to consider the following points, namely:—(1) The inconsistency, if any, between the charterparty and the bill of lading; (2) the authority of the master; (3) the incorporation of the charterparty in the bill of lading.

(ii.) The Inconsistency, if any, between the Charterparty and the Bill of Lading.

Where shipper charterer.

258. Where the goods are shipped by the charterer himself, and the bill of lading is taken by him in his own name, the bill of lading is, in the absence of anything to show the contrary, an acknowledgment only of the receipt of the goods (t), and the contract of carriage is to be found in the charterparty alone (a). A bill of lading, therefore, which differs in its terms from the charterparty does not override the charterparty (b), whether the difference arises from the addition of fresh terms, such as, for instance, a negligence clause (c), or from the omission (d) or alteration (e) of some of the terms of the charterparty. Since, however, the parties may vary their contract by agreement, the bill of lading will prevail over the charterparty, even as between the shipowner and the charterer, where they have expressly agreed to vary the contract as contained in the charterparty, and have inserted in the bill of lading a statement to that effect (f), or where it is otherwise clear from the circumstances that the contract is intended to be varied (g).

It is immaterial that the charterer was merely an agent acting on behalf of the real owner of the goods; as regards the principal, the charterparty is equally the contract (h).

259. Where the goods are shipped by a person other than the charterer, the position of the parties depends upon the circumstances of the particular case. The following cases may be distinguished (i), namely:— Where shipper not charterer.

(1) Where the charterparty amounts to a demise of the ship (k), it is reasonably clear that the contract under the bill of lading is between the shipper and the charterer, and not between the shipper and the shipowner (l). The shipowner has divested himself of his Charterparty by demise.

possession and control of the ship, and is therefore under no liability to the shipper (m), nor has he any rights against him (n).

Charterparty not amounting to demise.

(2) Where the charterparty does not amount to a demise, the contract under the bill of lading is, in the absence of circumstances pointing to a contrary conclusion, between the shipper and the shipowner, and not between the shipper and the charterer (o).

Usually the charterparty is nothing more than an undertaking by the charterer that a full cargo shall be shipped, accompanied by a guarantee that a certain freight shall be paid (p), and there is therefore no difficulty in holding that the shipowner is, as regards the bill of lading, a contracting party (q). This is clearly the case where the charterparty contains a cesser clause, which has come into operation and discharged the charterer from his liability to the shipowner (r). It is unnecessary, however, to consider the cesser clause or any of the clauses of a particular charterparty which does not amount to a demise, since the shipper's right to treat his contract as having been made with the shipowner is not excluded by reason of the existence of such a charterparty (s). The charterparty must be disregarded where the shipper never knew of its existence (t), or where, though he knew of its existence, he had no knowledge of its terms (a). Even the fact that the shipper knew its terms is not sufficient to exonerate the shipowner (b), though it may modify his liability (c). To exonerate the shipowner it is necessary to show that the contract was made with the charterer alone (d).

Sometimes an express contract to this effect may be proved (e); more usually it is to be inferred from the fact that the person who signed the bill of lading had no authority, express or implied, to sign it on behalf of the shipowner (f).

Rights of shipper.

The shipper, therefore, as a general rule is entitled to hold the shipowner responsible for his goods, and to claim delivery of them on the terms of the bill of lading (g). The shipowner cannot rely upon any terms in the charterparty which are not incorporated in the bill of lading (h). The shipper cannot, therefore, be required to pay freight at a rate greater than that fixed by the bill of lading, even though such greater rate is expressly stipulated for in the charterparty (i). The shipowner is entitled to a lien for the bill of lading freight (k); but he cannot claim to exercise any further lien given by the charterparty, whether for the difference between the chartered freight and the bill of lading freight (l), or for advance freight (m), dead freight, or demurrage at the port of loading (n). On the other hand, he is not excused for a failure to deliver the goods by an exception which appears only in the charterparty (o), nor can he rely upon the fact that the charterparty contained terms limiting the master's authority to sign bills of lading (p), or providing for the master to sign them as agent of the charterer (q), unless he can prove that the shipper was not merely aware that there was a charterparty (r), but actually knew that it contained such terms (s). The bill of lading signed must, however, if it is to bind the shipowner, be covered by the usual authority of the master or other agent who signed it (t).

A shipper who has shipped goods in ignorance of the terms of the charterparty cannot be called upon to accept a bill of lading drawn up in accordance with such terms, if they are unusual or if they impose undue liabilities upon him, as, for instance, where the shipowner is given a lien for chartered freight and demurrage (a). In this case the shipper is entitled to demand the redelivery of his goods free of all charges (b).

Position of consignee etc.

260. The transfer of the bill of lading to the consignee named therein, or to a bonâ fide holder for value, operates as a transfer of the contract contained in the bill of lading (c). The original contract between the shipowner and the shipper, whether expressed in a charterparty (d) or otherwise (e), is not transferred with the bill of lading, except in so far as it is incorporated therein (f). The shipowner cannot, as against the holder, rely upon any terms of the original contract which are not incorporated in the bill of lading (g), since the holder is not an assignee of the original contract, and is, therefore, not bound by its terms (h). The shipowner must perform the contract contained in the bill of lading, and is not excused for non-performance by any exception not contained in the bill of lading (i), or by any agreement between himself and the shipper inconsistent therewith (k). The holder is entitled to claim delivery on the terms of the bill of lading, if they differ from those of the charterparty (l). Thus, the shipowner cannot, as against the

A refusal by the master to sign bills of lading at a lower rate of freight unless the difference between the chartered freight and the bill of lading freight is paid to him does not entitle the shipper to demand redelivery of his goods (Ralli Brothers v. Paddington Steampship Co. (1900), 5 Com. Cas. 124).

(d) Oliver v. Muggeridge (1859), 7 W. R. 164. The same principle applies though the bill of lading is indorsed by the shipper to the charterer himself (Steamship Calcutta Co., Ltd. v. Weir (Andrew) & Co., [1910] 1 K. B. 759).

(e) Ohrloff v. Briscall, The "Helene" (1866), L. R. 1 P. C. 231; Leduc v. Ward (1888), 20 Q. B. D. 475, C. A.; compare The Emilien Marie (1875), 2 Asp. M. L. C. 514 (where arrangements had been made with various shippers as to priorities in the case of short delivery).

holder, claim freight at any other rate than that specified in the bill of lading (m), or assert a lien conferred by the charterparty but not incorporated in the bill of lading (n). Where the liability of the shipowner depends upon the authority of the person who signs it to bind the shipowner, the fact that the holder knows of the charterparty must be taken into consideration, since he cannot, as against the shipowner, rely upon a bill of lading which he knows to be in excess of the authority possessed by the shipowner's agent (o); but, if he does not know the terms of the charterparty, the mere knowledge of its existence does not prevent him from enforcing the bill of lading against the shipowner, even though the agent, in signing it, exceeded his actual authority (p). The bill of lading, however, in this case must be covered by the agent's usual authority (q), and the holder must, at the time when it was transferred to him, have had no reason to suspect that such authority had not been properly exercised (r).

Excess of authority.

261. A bill of lading which is in excess of the agent's usual authority, and which is not in fact authorised by the shipowner, does not bind the shipowner even in the hands of a bonâ fide holder for value (s).

Shipper's agent.

262. A holder of the bill of lading who is merely an agent of the shipper is in the position of the shipper (a).

(iii.) The Authority of the Master.

Extent of authority.

263. If the bill of lading is signed by an agent other than the master, such as, for instance, a broker (b), the existence of his authority to sign it is a question of fact, and the principal from whom his authority was derived, whether such principal is the shipowner or the charterer (c), is liable on his signature, provided that the agent has not exceeded his authority (d). If, however, the bill of lading is signed by the master, the position is complicated by the existence of his implied authority to bind the shipowner (e). It is, therefore, necessary to distinguish the following cases, namely:—

(1) Where the charterparty operates as a demise (f), the implied authority of the master to bind the shipowner is excluded, and his signature binds the charterer only (g);

(2) Where the charterparty does not operate as a demise, the master's implied authority to bind the shipowner by signing a bill of lading continues notwithstanding the charterparty (h).

As regards persons unacquainted with the terms of the charterparty, whether shippers, consignees, or indorsees of the bill of lading, the shipowner is bound by any bill of lading signed by the master within the usual authority of a master (i), even if the master's authority is in fact limited by the charterparty (k); he is only exempt from liability where the master has exceeded his usual authority (l). A limitation of the master's authority contained in the charterparty is effective as regards all persons acquainted with it (m).

Variation of charterparty.

As between the charterer and the shipowner, the master has no implied (n) authority to vary the terms of the contract contained in the charterparty, and he cannot, therefore, bind either of them by a variation in favour of the other (o). The charterparty may, however, stipulate that the master is to sign bills of lading as presented by the charterer without prejudice to the charterparty (p), and may further stipulate that the charterer is to indemnify the shipowner from all the consequences or liabilities which may arise from the master signing bills of lading (q). this case it is the charterer's duty to tender a bill of lading which is not inconsistent with and not to the prejudice of the charterparty (r); and if he fails to discharge this duty and presents a bill of lading, the signing of which involves the shipowner in liabilities to third persons, he must indemnify the shipowner (s). He cannot, where the charterparty is varied, treat the master's signature as falling within his implied authority (t), and if the bill of lading is manifestly inconsistent with the charterparty it is the master's duty to refuse to sign it (a).

(3) Where the master expressly signs the bill of lading as agent of the charterer and not as master, the shipowner is not liable (b).

Where contract to be found.

264. As between the shipowner and the charterer, the contract of carriage is contained in the charterparty (c); as regards other persons, it is to be found in the bill of lading (d). The terms of the charterparty are not as such binding either on the shipper, where he is not the charterer, or on the consignee or indorsee of the bill of lading, whether he knows of them (e) or not (f), though his knowledge of them precludes him from relying, as against the shipowner, on a bill of lading which is outside the master's actual authority (g).

The terms of the charterparty may, however, be incorporated in the bill of lading by express reference (h), and in this case they become terms of the contract contained in the bill of lading (i), capable of being enforced by (k) or against (l) the shipper, consignee, or indorsee, as the case may be.

SECT. 2. Bills of Lading.

Construction of reference to charterparty.

265. Any reference in the bill of lading to the charterparty is strictly construed (m). Thus, a stipulation that freight is to be paid as per the charterparty does not incorporate the lien for chartered freight given by the charterparty (n), or the stipulations as to demurrage contained therein (o); nor does a reference to the conditions of the charterparty incorporate its exceptions (p). Where the conditions of the charterparty are incorporated by reference, it does not necessarily follow that effect is to be given to every condition in the charterparty; conditions which are wholly insensible and inapplicable must be disregarded as being impossible of application (q). The conditions which are to be treated as incorporated are those which are to be performed by the person who has received the bill of lading and is taking delivery of his goods (r), such as, for instance, those relating to the payment of demurrage, whether at the port of loading (s) or at the port of discharge (t), or to the payment of freight (a), or to the manner of payment (b). On the other hand, conditions such as, for instance, arbitration clauses (c), or cesser clauses (d), which are not applicable to a bill of lading at all, are inoperative (e).

strict sense of the word are incorporated in the bill of lading where the intention to incorporate them is clear (f). Thus, the exceptions of the charterparty may be expressly made part of the bill of lading (g), or the bill of lading may provide for the incorporation of the terms, conditions, and clauses of the charterparty, in which case an indorsee is entitled to exercise rights conferred by the charterparty upon the charterer, such as, for instance, the right of ordering the ship to discharge in a particular dock (h).

267. A term of the charterparty which is, on the face of it, capable of being incorporated in the bill of lading must nevertheless be disregarded if it is inconsistent with an express term of the bill of lading (i). Thus, a provision in the charterparty providing for payment of a lump freight in the events that have happened cannot prevail against an express stipulation in the bill of lading that freight is to paid at a specified rate per ton, although the bill of lading also provides for payment of freight as per charterparty (k); nor can the shipowner claim to exercise his lien for the full chartered freight (l).

SECT. 3.—The Loading.

SUB-SECT. 1.—The Readiness of the Ship.

When charterer's obligation arises.

268. Where the ship in which the goods are to be carried is employed under a charterparty (m), certain conditions must be fulfilled by the shipowner before he is entitled to call upon the charterer to ship his goods. The ship must be at the place of loading contemplated by the charterparty (n); she must be ready to receive the goods on board (o), and notice of readiness must have been given to the charterer (p).

Proceeding to port of loading.

269. If the ship is not already lying in the port of loading at the time when the charterparty is made, she must proceed thither so as to arrive in time to load for the contemplated voyage (q). Where the port of loading is not specified in the charterparty, but is left to be named by the charterer (r), the shipowner's duty does not arise until the charterer has named it (s). The charterer must name (t) the port at which he desires the ship to load (a) within the time specified in the charterparty, or, if no time is specified, within a reasonable time (b).

Effect of delay.

270. Though it is the shipowner's duty to proceed to the port of loading with due diligence (c), mere delay in starting (d), or deviation on the way to the port of loading (e), is not in itself a breach of duty entitling the charterer to refuse to supply a cargo (f), though he will be entitled to recover such damages as he may have sustained by reason of the shipowner's lack of diligence (g). The position is not altered where the charterparty, as is usually the case, contains an express stipulation requiring the ship to proceed to the port of loading with all possible dispatch (h), since this stipulation is not to be regarded as a condition precedent (i), and the breach of it therefore gives a right to the charterer to recover damages only (k). Where, however, the delay or deviation is so great as in the mercantile sense to frustrate the mercantile adventure contemplated by the charterparty, there is a breach of a condition which goes to the root of the contract (l). The charterer is, therefore, in that case discharged from his obligation to supply a cargo (m), and may, in addition, unless the shipowner is protected by an exception (n), recover damages (o). The fact that the delay or deviation is occasioned by an excepted peril does not prevent the contract from being discharged, though the shipowner is, by reason of the exception, exempted from any liability arising in consequence of the failure to perform his duty (p).

Stipulations as to time.

271. The duty of the shipowner may be extended by the express stipulations of the charterparty, provided that it is clear from the language used that such is the intention of the parties (q). Thus, it may be stipulated that the ship is to sail for the port of loading on or before a named date (r). It is then made a condition of the contract that the ship shall sail (s) from the port in which she is lying by the given date. If she fails to do so, the charterer is entitled to refuse to supply a cargo (t), and may, in addition, unless the shipowner is excused by an exception, recover damages for the breach of the condition (a). It is immaterial that the ship has been prevented from sailing by an excepted peril (b); though in this case the exception operates to exonerate the shipowner from an action for damage, it does not affect the condition precedent upon which the charterer has contracted to take and load the ship (c). Similarly, a stipulation which specifies the date by which the ship is to arrive at the port of loading (d), or is to be ready to load (e), is to be construed as a condition the breach of which discharges the charterer from his obligation to supply a cargo (f), and may further entitle him to damages (g). In this case, too, it is equally immaterial that the shipowner's failure to fulfil the condition is attributable to an excepted peril (h), though in this case he is not liable in damages (i). The stipulation may, however, be so worded as to extend the operation of the exception to the voyage to the port of loading, and the charterer must then accept the ship,

SECT. 3. The Loading.

notwithstanding her failure to arrive by the specified date (k). The shipowner is not discharged from his duty to proceed to the port of loading by reason of the fact that it has already become impossible for the ship to arrive there by the due date (l); nor can he call upon the charterer to extend the time or otherwise to indicate his intention of accepting or refusing the ship (m). If, however, the charterer by his conduct leads the shipowner to believe that the ship will be loaded, and thus induces him to send the ship to the port of loading, the charterer cannot afterwards repudiate the contract on the ground that the condition has been broken (n).

Reaching the port of loading.

"So near thereto as she can safely get."

272. The ship must reach the port of loading specified in the charterparty, or, if the charterparty contains the usual protective alternative, "so near thereto as she can safely get" (o). The effect of the alternative is to excuse the shipowner from his duty to reach the port of loading, if he is prevented from doing so by some obstruction which is not merely of a temporary nature or such as must necessarily be incident to every contract for a voyage to the port in question (p). Since, however, the ship, after loading, has to leave the port with her cargo on board, the extent of the shipowner's duty is to be measured, when the obstruction is physical, by the capacity of the ship when loaded, and not merely by her ability to enter the port when empty (q). Thus, where there is a bar obstructing access to the port of loading, the shipowner cannot be required to send his ship across the bar if, whatever the state of the water, she will be unable to recross it when loaded (r); and if she does in fact enter and load as much cargo as can safely be carried across the bar (s), he is entitled to call upon the charterer to complete the loading at his own expense outside (t). Where, however, the depth of water in the bar will, in the ordinary course of events, become sufficient within a reasonable time to enable the ship to cross and to recross it in safety as a laden ship, it is the shipowner's duty to wait for a reasonable time and to proceed to the actual port of loading when the water permits; and if he fails to do so he is liable in damages to the charterer for his breach of duty (a). Similarly, where the port is tidal, the ship is bound to wait till the tide serves, including, if requisite, a spring tide (b); it is immaterial that the stipulation contains the qualification "always afloat," if the port is accessible at certain states of the tide (c). If, however, the stipulation is further qualified by the words "at all times of the tide," the shipowner cannot be compelled to send his ship into a port where she must necessarily take the ground when the tide is low (d).

There may, however, be a custom to load part of the cargo inside the bar, and to complete the loading outside; see Herring v. Ward (1839), 8 L. J. (Q. B.) 218.

"At all times of the tide."

If the port of loading is not specified in the charterparty, but is left to be named by the charterer (e), the effect of naming it is the same as if it had been specified in the charterparty (f). The shipowner, therefore, cannot be required to proceed to a port which the ship would not be able to leave when loaded (g). In practice it is usually stipulated that the charterer must name a "safe port" (h).

SECT. 3. The Loading.

detention (i), time begins to run against the charterer from the arrival of the ship at her port of loading (k), it is necessary to consider the question whether the shipowner's duty requires him to reach the particular berth at which the ship is to lie during the loading before the ship can be said to have arrived, or whether he sufficiently satisfies it by reaching the port, so that any delay incurred afterwards in getting to the berth falls to be borne by the charterer (l). The answer to this question depends upon the language of the particular charterparty (m), and also upon the usage of trade as applied to the port of loading (n). Three cases must be distinguished (o), namely:—

Arrival at port.

(1) The charterparty may stipulate simply that the ship is to arrive at the specified port, without any further particularity or qualification (p). In this case the word "port" must not be applied in its geographical, fiscal, or pilotage sense (q); the ship has not necessarily arrived within the meaning of the charterparty because she is within the geographical or legal limits of the port (r). The word must be construed in a commercial sense as meaning the commercial area known and treated as the port by all persons engaged in the shipping of merchandise, whether as shippers, charterers, or shipowners (s). The ship is not, therefore, to be considered as having arrived until she has reached the usual place in the port at which loading vessels lie (t). When she has reached this place the shipowner's duty has been fulfilled; it is not necessary that the ship should actually be in the particular part of the port in which the particular cargo is to be loaded (a). Since, however, evidence of usage is admissible to interpret the charterparty (b), the charterer may succeed in proving that by the custom of the port the ship is not considered to have arrived until she has reached some particular place within the commercial port, such as, for instance, a dock (c) or quay (d); and in such a case, until she has done so time does not begin to run against him.

The charterer is entitled to name the actual loading berth, and the ship must proceed to it before he can be called upon to supply a cargo (e); but, as the ship is already an arrived ship within the meaning of the charterparty, time runs against him notwithstanding that the ship is delayed in reaching it (f).

Arrival in specified area.

(2) The charterparty may specify an area within a port, such as, for example, a basin, a dock, or a certain distance or reach of shore on the sea coast or in a river (g). In this case the ship is not an arrived ship within the meaning of the charterparty until she is within the specified area (h); but when once she is there the shipowner's duty is fulfilled, and it is not necessary that she should actually reach her loading berth before time begins to run against the charterer (i). Thus, where the specified place of loading is a dock, the ship's arrival at the dock gate is not a sufficient discharge of the shipowner's duty (k), except when the ship is prevented from entering the dock by some obstruction which entitles the shipowner to claim that she has arrived as near to the dock as she can safely get (l), or when, by reason of the charterer's prior engagements, she is not permitted to enter by the dock authorities (m). Except in these cases, she must enter the dock before the charterer's obligation to provide a cargo attaches (n); but unless there is a custom to the contrary, time begins to run against the charterer as soon as she has entered it (o). If, therefore, she is for some time unable to reach her actual loading berth, the delay falls upon the charterer (p). The same principle applies when the charterparty does not specify any particular dock, but provides merely that the loading is to take place in a dock to be named by the charterer (q).

SECT. 3. The Loading.

Arrival at berth.

(3) The charterparty may specify the precise spot at which the physical act of loading is to take place, such as, for instance, a particular quay, pier, wharf, or spot, or, where the loading is to be performed by means of lighters and the ship is not to be in a shore berth, a particular mooring (r). In this case the ship is not an arrived ship, and the charterer's obligation to provide a cargo does not arise, until she has actually reached the precise spot specified in the charterparty (s). The same principle applies when the actual loading berth is to be named by the charterer (t). In this case the charterer must name the berth within a reasonable time, otherwise he is liable for the consequences of his neglect or refusal to do so (a). The berth named must, however, be one to which, by the terms of the charterparty, the charterer is entitled to direct the ship to proceed; if it is not such a berth, the charterer is responsible for any delay arising from the fact that he has named an improper berth (b). The charterer is not bound to name a berth which is immediately available; a berth is not an improper berth because the ship will have to wait until the spring tide (c), or because it is already engaged for other ships which will take precedence (d). It must, however, be a berth which will be available within a reasonable time (e).

Readiness to load.

274. The ship must be ready to load, that is to say, the ship-owner must be in a position to place the whole of the chartered space (f) at the charterer's disposal (g). The duty must be performed within the time fixed by the charterparty, or within a reasonable time, as the case may be (h); otherwise the charterer is entitled to recover damages, and may, in addition, refuse to load (i). Frequently the charterparty contains an express stipulation entitling the charterer to cancel the contract if the ship is not ready to load within a specified time; but this stipulation is unnecessary (k). If, therefore, the ship has arrived at the port of loading with a cargo on board, the whole of the cargo must have been discharged before she can be said to be ready to load; it is not sufficient that part of the cargo has been discharged and that some of the holds are available for the receipt of the new cargo (l). It is not, however, necessary, when she is otherwise ready to load, that she should be actually lying at her loading berth, provided that she is an arrived ship within the meaning of the charterparty (m). Where the charterparty stipulates for ballast being supplied by the charterer before loading (n), upon the master giving notice of readiness to receive it, the ship is not ready to load until the ballast has been supplied; it is immaterial that she is ready to receive it, and that the charterer, though he has been given notice of readiness, has failed to supply it (o).

Pratique etc.

275. The shipowner does not perform his duty merely by providing a ship which is physically ready to load; he must also have obtained pratique (p) and have complied with any other requirements which may be imposed upon him (q) by the law of the port of loading (r).

Notice of readiness.

276. The shipowner must give the charterer notice that the ship has arrived and that she is ready to load (s). Until such notice has been received by the charterer, his obligation to provide a cargo does not arise (t). If, therefore, he receives no notice until after the time fixed by the charterparty for the loading (a) or after a reasonable time (b), as the case may be, he is wholly discharged from the contract. On the other hand, since it is his duty to have the cargo ready for loading (c), time begins to run against him as soon as he has received notice (d). It is not necessary that the charterparty should contain any express stipulation as to notice (e); in practice, however, a stipulation as to notice is usually inserted (f). Under such a stipulation the charterer's obligation to provide a cargo may be postponed until the expiration of a specified period after notice (g).

Position of shipper other than charterer.

277. Where goods are to be shipped by a shipper other than the charterer, the shipowner, except in so far as he may be bound to accept the goods if delivered to him for carriage (h), owes no duties to the shipper until the contract under which the goods are to be carried is made. Unless, therefore, the contract has been made in advance, the duties of the shipowner as regards arrival at the port of loading, readiness to load, and notice of readiness will hardly be applicable. He is, however, bound to carry the goods in accordance with the contract, when made; if, therefore, he is unable to take them on board through want of room, he is guilty of a breach of contract, the measure of damages being, presumably, any extra freight that may have to be paid (i), and any expenses incurred in warehousing the goods until they can be sent on by another ship (k).

Implied condition of seaworthiness during loading.

278. There is one condition, however, which is to be implied in the contract of carriage, whether contained in a charterparty, bill of lading, or otherwise (l), namely, that the ship on which goods are to be loaded must be seaworthy at the time when the loading begins (m). If, therefore, she is not seaworthy, she cannot be considered ready to load; the owner of the goods is justified in refusing to put them on board (n), and may further maintain an action against the shipowner for breach of the condition (o). If the breach of condition is not discovered till after the goods have been loaded, their owner may demand their redelivery, and the shipowner will not only be bound to redeliver them, but must also pay damages, the measure of damages being the expenses incurred in landing and warehousing the goods, and the amount of any damage actually sustained by the goods (p). Usually the breach of condition does not become apparent until after the ship has sailed, and redelivery has therefore become impossible. In this case the shipowner is liable for all loss or damage sustained by the goods (q); he must discharge any liabilities to third persons to which the goods may become subject in consequence of his breach of condition, such as, for instance, liens for salvage (r), or general average contributions (s), though he is at the same time precluded from asserting against the owner of the goods any claim for general average contributions in his own right (t). Where the ship is employed under a charter-party the shipowner must indemnify the charterer against the claims of third persons whose goods have been carried upon the ship, and who, under the particular contract of carriage, have the right to hold the charterer responsible for the breach of condition (a).

279. This condition, which must be distinguished from the wider condition which comes into operation at the time of sailing (b), comprises the following undertakings, namely:— Scope of condition:

(1) The ship must be seaworthy in the strict sense of the word, that is to say, she must be reasonably fit to encounter the ordinary perils that are likely to arise during the loading (c). Unless, therefore, she is in a condition in all respects to render her reasonably safe during her stay in port and whilst loading, the (1) fitness to encounter perils;

SECT. 3. The Loading.

owner of the goods may refuse to put them on board (d). It is not, however, necessary that she should be seaworthy in the sense that she is fit to begin her voyage (e), provided that she is capable of being made seaworthy in that sense within a reasonable time (f).

(2) fitness to receive goods.

(2) The ship must be seaworthy in the sense that she is reasonably fit for the reception of the goods contracted to be carried, and for carrying them upon the voyage (g); in other words, she must be cargo-worthy, or the owner of the goods may refuse to load her (h). The fitness of the ship is to be measured by the particular cargo which she is under contract to carry; if she is not fit to carry that cargo, there is a breach of the condition, notwithstanding that she may be fit to carry any other cargo that might have been put forward (i). Similarly, where the cargo is composed of different kinds of goods, she must be fit to carry them all; it is not sufficient that she is fit to carry some of them, if she is unfit to carry others (k). The owner of the goods is not, however, entitled to refuse to load them merely because he believes that the ship is unfit to carry them; to justify his refusal he must prove that she is in fact unfit to do so (l).

What constitutes breach of condition.

280. The duty imposed upon the shipowner by this condition is absolute; if the ship is in fact unfit at the time when the undertaking comes into operation, it does not matter that her unfitness is due to some latent defect of which he did not know, and it is no excuse for the existence of such a defect that he has used his best endeavour to make the ship as good as she can be made (m). The place provided by the shipowner for the storage of the cargo during the voyage must be free from defects rendering it an unsafe place of storage (n). It is immaterial whether the defect is one of construction, as, for instance, where bullion is placed in a bullion room which is not reasonably fit to resist thieves (o), or whether it is one of a temporary nature, as, for instance, where the cargo is placed in a hold which has not been properly cleansed (p), or which already contains goods which, from their nature, are likely to have a deleterious effect upon the cargo in question (q). The defect may be outside the place of storage altogether (r): thus, where, from the nature of the cargo, special machinery or plant (s) is required for the purpose of keeping it in a merchantable state throughout the voyage, such as, for instance, pumps for drawing off the drainings from a cargo of wet sugar (t), or refrigerating plant for preserving a cargo of frozen meat (a), or fans for ventilating a cargo of live cattle (b), the machinery or plant supplied by the shipowner must be reasonably fit for the purpose. There is a breach of the condition if they prove inadequate (c), or if, during the voyage, they break down or fail to act owing to some initial defect (d).

281. The shipowner is not protected against the consequences of a breach of this condition by the ordinary exceptions contained in the charterparty or bill of lading (e). These exceptions relate only to his liability as carrier (f), and presuppose a due performance of the conditions precedent to the loading (g). An intention to exclude any such condition precedent, and to protect the shipowner against his failure to perform it, must be indicated

(s) It is the duty of the shipowner to supply such machinery or plant; see the cases cited infra, and p. 225, post. There is no breach of this duty where the shipowner omits to provide plant which he is, by statute, required to provide for some purpose not relating to the safe carriage of the goods (Gorris v. Scott (1874), L. R. 9 Exch. 125, where the shipowner was under a statutory obligation to provide pens for sheep as a precaution against disease, and it was held that he was not liable for the loss of sheep which had been washed overboard owing to the absence of the pens).

SECT. 3. The Loading.

by an express stipulation (h), framed in clear and unambiguous language (i). Under the ordinary forms of stipulation in use the shipowner is not relieved entirely from his duty to make the ship seaworthy (k); it is usually stipulated either that he is not to be liable for unseaworthiness provided that all reasonable means have been taken to provide against it (l), or, in more stringent terms, that any latent defects in hull or machinery are not to be considered unseaworthiness, provided that they do not result from want of due diligence on the part of the shipowner or his servant (m).

Unseaworthiness subsequently arising.

282. The shipowner has sufficiently performed his duty if the ship which he provides is seaworthy at the commencement of the loading; it is not an implied condition that she shall continue to be seaworthy during the loading (n). If, therefore, she is subsequently rendered unseaworthy by some excepted cause, the shipowner is not precluded from relying upon the exception (o), since the voyage to which the exceptions in the charterparty apply must, for this purpose (p), be regarded as having commenced (q).

SUB-SECT. 2.—The Provision of a Cargo.

When cargo must be ready.

283. When the ship is ready to load and the charterer is duly notified, it becomes his duty to provide the stipulated cargo (r) within the time specified in the charterparty or within a reasonable time, as the case may be (s). Where this cargo is to be procured and how it is to be conveyed to the place of loading are matters which precede the whole operation of loading and form no part of it, but belong to that which, in the absence of express stipulation, is exclusively the charterer's business (t). They fall wholly outside the charterparty, and do not in any way concern the shipowner, since the charterparty contemplates that the charterer will have his cargo ready at the place of loading at the time when the ship is ready to receive it (a). If, therefore, the cargo is not ready at the place of loading, so that the loading of the ship is in consequence delayed or rendered impossible, the charterer is, generally speaking, guilty of a breach of condition, which may discharge the shipowner from his obligation to receive the cargo (b), and in any case entitles him to damages (c), whatever may be the cause to which the delay or impossibility is attributable (d).

The charterer must also procure any permit that may be necessary for the shipment of the cargo (Kirk v. Gibbs (1857), 1 H. & N. 810). As to what is a sufficient compliance with this requirement, see Johnson v. Greaves (1810), 2 Taunt. 344; Haines v. Busk (1814), 5 Taunt. 521.

Duty to procure cargo.

284. In performing his duty the first step which the charterer must take is to procure a cargo (e). The cargo must correspond with the description of the cargo in the charterparty (f), and must be of the stipulated quantity (g). The charterer is, as a general rule, responsible for a failure to procure a cargo in due time, or at all (h). Even the impossibility of procuring a cargo does not excuse him (i). The stipulated cargo may not exist (k); it may be impossible in the existing state of things to obtain it (l); its exportation may be restricted (m) or prohibited (n) by the Government of the place whence it is to be procured. Nevertheless, in all these cases the charterer is responsible for his failure, whether total (o) or partial (p), to procure it, unless the whole transaction is vitiated by illegality.

Conveyance to place of loading.

285. After procuring the cargo, the charterer must have it conveyed to the place of loading, so that it may be ready for shipment (q). This conveyance of the cargo is no part of the loading (r); and the charterer is, as a general rule, responsible for all delays or accidents, however caused, arising during such conveyance (s). Where, however, it is the practice not to store the cargo at the place of loading, but to store it at a distance till required (t), or to bring it direct from the place where it is procured to the ship (a), the conveyance from the place where the cargo actually is to the ship is to be considered as part of the act of loading (b), and the responsibility of the charterer as regards the conveyance is then the same as in the case of the loading (c).

Excuses:

286. The charterer is, however, excused for a breach of this duty to provide cargo:—

(1) breach of condition precedent;

(1) Where the shipowner has already failed to perform a condition precedent to the loading (d) the contract is discharged (e), and the charterer, therefore, may refuse to provide a cargo (f). He

Hence the charterer may choose his own mode of conveyance; if, therefore, he is put to extra expense, e.g., for detention of railway trucks, by reason of the shipowner's failure to be ready, the shipowner must pay it, notwithstanding that it might have been avoided if the charterer had followed the ordinary course of business at the particular dock (Welch, Perrin & Co. v. Anderson, Anderson & Co. (1891), 7 Asp. (e) If the shipowner is guilty of a breach of a stipulation which is not a condition, the charterer is not excused (Ohlsen v. Drummond (1785), 2 Chit. 705; Barker v. Windle (1854), 6 E. & B. 675, Ex. cannot, however, refuse to do so if he has waived the breach of condition (g).

(2) premature readiness of ship;

(2) Where the ship is ready to load before she could reasonably be anticipated to be ready, the charterer's duty to provide a cargo does not arise until the date at which in the ordinary course of events the ship would have been placed at his disposal, and he is not responsible for any delay occasioned by his failure to have his cargo ready sooner (h). Thus, where the ship is to be loaded in turn, and an unexpected opportunity to load her arises, owing to the fact that other ships having priority to her are not ready to load when their turn arrives, and consequently lose it, the charterer is not guilty of a breach of duty because he has failed to foresee what has happened and has no cargo in readiness (i). On the other hand, if there are facilities at the place of loading for storing cargo, and the contingency that the ship might be able to load at an earlier date is one that might reasonably have been foreseen, considering the course of business at the place of loading, it is the charterer's duty to be prepared for such a contingency, and if he has no cargo ready he is responsible for the delay that ensues (k).

(3) outbreak of war;

(3) Where the charterer is a British subject, and the cargo is to be procured and loaded in a foreign country, the outbreak of war between the United Kingdom and such foreign country discharges the charterer from the contract, and, consequently, from his obligation to procure the cargo (l).

(4) circumstances contemplated;

(4) Where the cargo is to be procured from a particular source of supply defined by the charterparty, such as, for instance, a named colliery (m), and both parties at the time of making the charterparty are aware of circumstances peculiar to the source of supply which may lead to delay in procuring a cargo or in conveying it to the place of loading, they must be taken to have assumed as the basis of their contract the possibility of more or less delay (n). The charterer, therefore, is not responsible for any delay the cause of which was within the contemplation of the parties (o). This is clearly the case where the cause of delay, such as, for instance, the breakdown of machinery at the colliery, actually exists, to the knowledge of both parties, at the time when the charterparty is made (p). The principle equally applies where the cause of delay, though not in fact operative at the date of the contract, was, according to the knowledge and experience of the parties, likely to operate at any time (q). Thus, where the colliery designated is one of limited output, and by the custom of the port the ship cannot be loaded without a loading order from the colliery, the charterer is not responsible for any delay occasioned by the necessity of waiting for a loading order to be issued according to the colliery turn (r). The same principle may be applicable to the case where the contemplated cause wholly prevents the charterers from procuring a cargo (s). It may, perhaps, also apply to the case where the contract is not in general terms to provide a cargo, but to load a specific cargo, if such cargo is destroyed without the fault of the charterer before the time of loading arrives (t).

(5) exceptions.

(5) Where the charterparty contains an exception which covers the cause of delay or failure, as the case may be, the charterer is excused (a). The exceptions usually contained in a charterparty are, unless the contrary intention is clearly expressed, to be understood as applying only to the actual loading (b); they do not, therefore, protect the charterer against the consequences of delay (c) or failure (d) in matters which precede the loading and form no part of it (e). Thus, an express exception against frost does not cover delay in the conveyance of the cargo to the place of loading, although such delay is in fact caused by frost (f). Where, however, it is clear that the conveyance to the place of loading forms part of the act of loading (g), an exception covering delay in loading will equally cover delay in the conveyance (h).

Scope of exceptions.

The exception may be so framed as to apply to matters preceding the loading and to include delay or failure in the procuring of the cargo (i) or in its conveyance to the place of loading (k). Unless,

To be excused for his failure to perform his duty, he must show that all available sources of supply or all practicable methods of conveyance, as the case may be, were equally affected by the excepted peril (n). In no case, however, is he protected where it appears that the delay or failure might have been avoided if only he had taken reasonable steps for the purpose (o).

Effect of exception on demurrage.

If at the time when the excepted peril happens the ship is already on demurrage, the exception, even though it applies to delay or failure in procuring or conveying the cargo, is not as a general rule available, since once the ship is on demurrage the charterer is in default and time runs against him without a break (p). It is not unusual, however, for the charterparty to contain an express stipulation suspending the liability for demurrage in certain events (q), and such stipulation may apply to matters arising before the actual loading (r).

SECT. 3. The Loading.

goods brought to him (b), is a common carrier (c). He is therefore bound, like any other common carrier, on payment of a reasonable charge, to accept for the purpose of carriage all goods brought to him, provided that they are goods which he holds himself out as carrying in the ordinary course of business, and that there is room in the ship for them (d). A shipowner who is not a common carrier is not bound to accept any goods, unless he has entered into a contract to that effect (e). Thus, a shipowner whose ship has been chartered to carry goods on an outward voyage to a particular port is not bound to accept a cargo from the charterer for the return voyage, but may load goods for his own benefit, or bring the ship home in ballast at his pleasure (f). If, however, he has contracted to load goods belonging to a particular shipper, he is bound to accept them when tendered unless he has some lawful excuse (g); otherwise he is guilty of a breach of contract sounding in damages (h).

Excuses :

He is excused in the following cases, namely :—

(1) failure to load ;

(1) Where the shipper fails to tender any goods within the period allowed for loading (i), the shipowner is not bound to wait any longer (k), and a tender of goods at a later date is inoperative (l). He is not, however, entitled to depart sooner, since he is under contract to remain the full period (m), unless the contract has already been repudiated by the shipper (n), and the repudiation has been accepted by the shipowner as a final breach (o).

(2) refusal to load ;

(2) Where the shipper refuses to load, the shipowner may treat his refusal as a final breach discharging the contract (p). He may at once bring an action against the shipper for the breach, and is not bound to wait until the expiration of the period allowed for loading (q). In this case a tender of goods after the breach has been accepted as final is inoperative (r). On the other hand, the shipowner may decline to treat the shipper's refusal as a final breach, in which case the contract is not discharged, but remains in force (s). There is, therefore, no breach until the period allowed for loading has expired without the shipper having delivered his goods to the shipowner (t). Until such period has expired the shipper may at any time withdraw his refusal and begin to load, or he may be released in the meantime from his obligation to load by the happening of an excepted event (u).

(3) cargo not as described;

(3) Where the goods tendered do not correspond with the description in the contract (a) the shipowner may refuse them (b). If, however, the contract gives the shipper an option under which he may select the goods to be loaded, he may exercise his option as he thinks fit (c); and, provided that the shipper exercises his option reasonably, the shipowner cannot refuse the goods tendered on the ground that it would be more advantageous to him if the option was exercised in a different manner (d).

(4) dangerous goods;

(4) Where the goods tendered, though otherwise in accordance with the contract, are of a dangerous nature (e), the shipowner may refuse to accept them (f), unless, with knowledge of their nature, he has expressly contracted to carry them (g).

(5) improper packing;

(5) Where the goods tendered are improperly or insufficiently packed, the shipowner may refuse to accept them (h). He cannot, however, insist on the goods being packed in any other than the usual packages (i).

(6) excessive amount;

(6) Where under a contract for a full and complete cargo more goods are tendered than the ship can reasonably stow, the shipowner is entitled to refuse the excess (k). He must, however, fulfil the contract by loading the ship to her full capacity (l). Where he has contracted to carry a specified quantity of goods (m) he must find room for them, otherwise he will be liable in damages for failing to load them, unless the contract is made subject to there being room in the ship (n).

(7) exceptions.

(7) Where the operation of loading, so far as it falls to be performed by the shipowner, is prevented or delayed by some cause excepted in the contract (o), the shipowner is excused for the failure or delay (p), provided that he has taken all reasonable precautions to ensure the due performance of the loading (q). The same principle applies where the prevention or delay is attributable to a cause within the contemplation of the parties at the date of the contract (r).

Place of delivery to ship.

288. Apart from custom or special contract, it is the duty of the charterer or other shipper, at his own expense, to bring the goods to the side of the ship, within reach of her tackle (s), and to deliver them there to the shipowner, or to his servants authorised to take delivery on his behalf (t). If, therefore, the ship is lying at a wharf the shipper must deliver the goods alongside; he is not entitled simply to deposit them on the wharf at some distance from the ship and to require the shipowner, at his own expense, to provide the necessary labour for removing them from the place of deposit to the ship (a). If the ship is lying at anchor during the loading, so that the goods have to be taken out to her in lighters, it is the duty of the shipper to provide the necessary lighters and to pay the expenses of lightering the goods (b). The shipowner or his servants may, however, consent to accept delivery of the goods before they are actually brought alongside, and in this case the necessary expenses of removal to the ship will be borne by the shipowner (c). Thus, where the ship has to be loaded afloat, the charterparty may provide that the goods are to be taken from the shore to the ship at the shipowner's expense (d), and there may be a custom of the port of loading to the same effect (e). Any such custom is, however, excluded by an express provision of the charterparty that the goods are to be delivered alongside by the charterer (f). An agreement on the part of the shipowner to bear the expenses of removal is not to be inferred from the mere fact that he has provided the necessary labour for the purpose upon the shipper's refusal to do so (g).

Effect of delivery.

289. Upon delivery the shipper's responsibility ceases, since he has fulfilled his contract (h). If the goods put on board are destroyed through any cause, he cannot be compelled to replace them (i); and, if it becomes necessary to unload the ship for some temporary purpose, the shipowner must bear the expenses of unloading and reloading (k). The shipper is entitled to demand redelivery of the goods shipped if he is refused a bill of lading (l), or is tendered a bill of lading of improper form (m); he cannot, however, demand them in any other case without paying the freight which would have been earned by their carriage (n) and indemnifying the master against the consequences of having signed a bill of lading for them (o). In the case of the charterer payment of freight is not a necessary condition precedent to redelivery, since his obligation under the charterparty to ship a cargo revives (p).

Risk during delivery.

290. Until delivery the goods remain at the shipper's risk (q). If, therefore, lightering is necessary, the risks of the transit from shore to ship fall upon him and not upon the shipowner (r). Where there is a charterparty, the duty of the charterer to provide a cargo in accordance with his contract is not wholly discharged until he has actually delivered to the ship the whole of the cargo contracted for (s). It is immaterial that he has fulfilled the conditions precedent to the loading and has his cargo in readiness (t). If, therefore, the actual operation of loading is delayed, interrupted, or prevented through the intervention of any cause whatever (a), he is, unless he has some lawful excuse, responsible in damages for any detention of the ship beyond the time allowed for loading (b) or for any loss arising from deficiency in the quantity delivered (c), and may, in addition, where he is wholly unable to deliver his cargo to the ship within such time, discharge the shipowner from his duty to receive the cargo (d).

When charterer excused: (1) shipowner's default;

The charterer is excused for failure or delay in loading in the following cases, namely:—

(1) Where the delay or failure is attributable to the shipowner's inability, without lawful excuse, to perform his part of the loading, the charterer is not responsible (e). In this case he is entitled to receive from the shipowner any damages sustained in consequence of such delay or failure (f). Where, however, the loading is to be performed by the shipowner and the charterer jointly, the charterer is not excused (g) unless he is in fact prevented from performing his part by reason of the shipowner's inability to perform his own part of the operation (h). altogether, the charterer is discharged from his obligation to load, and need not ship his goods even though the shipowner subsequently offers to accept them (i).

(2) contemplated cause;

(2) Where the delay or failure in loading is attributable to a cause within the contemplation of the parties at the time when the charterparty is made, the charterer is not responsible (k).

(3) performance unlawful;

(3) Where the performance of the contract has become unlawful, the charterer is released from his obligation to load (l).

(4) exceptions.

(4) Where the delay or failure in loading is attributable to some cause expressly excepted by the contract, the charterer is not responsible (m). The ordinary exceptions of the charterparty inserted for the protection of the charterer (n) do not apply, unless the charterer is ready with his cargo and is in a position to commence the actual operation of loading (o). Thus, where the cargo is stored at a place some distance from the ship, and the charterer is prevented by some excepted peril from bringing it alongside the ship, he is not excused unless it is clear that the parties contemplated that the cargo would be stored in that place, so that its conveyance thence to the ship is to be regarded as part of the operation of loading (p). In no case, however, is the charterer protected if he is himself in default (q).

Destruction of goods.

The destruction of such goods as have already been put on board does not discharge the charterer from his duty to complete the loading (r), even though such destruction is due to an excepted peril (s). Since, however, the delivery of the goods destroyed has discharged him pro tanto, he cannot be required to load other goods to take their place (t), nor, apparently, can he claim the right to do so (a); in this case the shipowner is entitled to fill the space left vacant by shipping goods for his own benefit (b).

When goods at shipowner's risk.

291. The shipowner's responsibility attaches as soon as the goods are received by his servants (c). It is his duty, apart from special contract or usage (d), to have the goods put on board and duly stowed in the holds or other places provided for the purpose, and to pay the expenses of so doing, including the cost of conveyance to the ship, where delivery is taken before they are brought alongside (e). The goods are then at his risk, and, except in so far as he has some lawful excuse (f), he is liable if they are lost or damaged after they have come to his hands (g). His liability being thus absolute, it is unnecessary, in a sense, to consider what are his duties in connexion with the loading, since it is immaterial whether the loss or damage is attributable to his negligence in performing such duties (h) or to some accidental cause beyond his control (i). He cannot, however, claim the benefit of any exception in the charterparty unless he has duly performed his duties in connexion with the loading (k), except in so far as he has been prevented from doing so by the cause specified in the exception (l); nor can he hold the charterer responsible for the detention of the ship where the delay in loading the ship is attributable to his own default (m).

(a) This seems to follow from the fact that the shipowner is equally discharged pro tanto by his receipt of the original goods.

If the shipowner by his contract undertakes to accept the goods at a distance and to convey them to the ship, his liability during the conveyance is, apart from any special term in the contract, apparently that of an ordinary bailee (Nottebohn v. Richter (1886), 18 Q. SECT. 3.
The Loading.

Duties of shipowner.

292. It is the duty of the shipowner, except where he engages a stevedore for the purpose, to employ a master who is competent to supervise the operation of loading (n), and, if the master is guilty of negligence in that behalf, the shipowner is responsible (o). Suitable tackle must be provided for the purpose of hoisting the goods on board and lowering them into the holds (p), and efficient men must be employed to work the tackle and to stow the goods (q). The goods must be stowed with due care and skill (r), any dunnage (s) that may be required for the purpose of protecting them during the voyage being provided (t). If they are improperly stowed, and are in consequence destroyed or damaged by some cause which would not have been able to operate but for such improper stowage, the shipowner is not protected by an exception which covers the actual cause of the destruction or damage (a). Thus, where goods fetch away in a storm and are broken, the shipowner cannot rely upon an exception that he is not to be accountable for breakage if it is shown (b) that the loss was consequent on the negligent manner in which they were stowed (c); where casks are

S.) 894, 911, Ex. Ch.). He is also responsible to the shipowner where, but only where, he is personally guilty of negligence (Blaikie v. Stembridge, supra; Swainston v. Garrick, supra). Where, however, the stevedore is the servant of the charterer, the master is not responsible, either to the shipper or to the shipowner, for the stevedore's negligence (Blaikie v. Stembridge, supra; Swainston v. Garrick, supra); see p. 207, post.

SECT. 3. The Loading.

strained through the pitching of the ship in heavy weather and allow their contents to escape, he is responsible if the casks were badly stowed, in spite of an exception in the contract against perils of the sea (d), or even against leakage (e), though he would have been protected by such exception if he had not been in default (f). The same principle applies where goods of different kinds are stowed either in contact or in close proximity to each other, and the goods of one of the kinds are in consequence injuriously affected by the proximity of goods of another kind (g). Thus, if barrels containing liquids are stowed along with goods which are liable to heat, and, in consequence of such goods heating, the barrels are caused to become leaky so that their contents escape and are lost, the shipowner is guilty of negligence if such heating and consequent leakage ought reasonably to have been foreseen by him (h), since it was his duty to guard against the consequences by stowing the two parcels of goods in places where they could not affect each other (i), and, being guilty of negligence in the performance of this duty, he cannot claim the protection of an express exception against leakage (k). If, on the other hand, he was ignorant of the consequences that might ensue from the proximity of the two parcels, and could not reasonably be expected to foresee them, he is not guilty of negligence, and may therefore rely upon the exception (l). If there is no exception in the contract applicable to the cause of loss, no question of negligent stowage arises; however masterly the mode of stowage may have been he is responsible, since the goods are at his risk (m). Thus, the ordinary exceptions against heating, leakage or the like apply only to the actual goods which heat or leak; they do not cover the loss which other goods sustain in consequence of such heating or leakage (n). For this purpose a special form of exception is required. Sometimes the contract expressly provides that the shipowner is not to be responsible for negligent or improper stowage (o), or it may be framed in terms sufficiently wide to cover it (p); but the ordinary negligence clause is not sufficient (q).

Place of stowage.

293. The goods shipped must be stowed in the proper places provided for the purpose (r). The shipper has no right to claim the use of any other part of the ship (s), nor can the shipowner insist on stowing them elsewhere (t). If, apart from agreement, he does so, he is responsible for any loss or damage sustained by the goods, and cannot rely upon any exception of the contract to exempt him from responsibility (a). The deck is not a proper place of stowage (b), and the shipowner is not entitled to stow goods on deck (c), except in the following cases, namely:—

Deck cargo.

(1) Where a usage of trade has sanctioned the practice (d). It is not sufficient that it is usual, unless the shipper expressly stipulates to the contrary, to carry the particular goods on deck (e).

(2) Where the master has the shipper's consent to stow the goods on deck (f). There may have been an express term of the contract to this effect (g); and it seems that the shipper's consent may be implied from his conduct, as where he sees the goods stowed on deck and makes no objection (h), or from the nature of the goods being such that they cannot be stowed below deck (i).

When shipowner not liable.

294. If the contract provides that the charterer is himself to load the goods and to be responsible for their proper stowage, the shipowner is clearly not liable for bad stowage (k). Nor is he liable where the charterer or his agent (l) is present during the operation of loading, and, with full knowledge of what is being done, does not object either to the methods (m) or places (n) of stowage, or to the manner in which the loading is carried out (o).

Employment of stevedore.

295. Where the actual work of the loading is delegated to a stevedore, the stevedore is, as a general rule, to be regarded as the servant of the shipowner, who, as being the person primarily responsible for the loading, is liable to the shipper (p), in the absence of an exception covering the stevedore's negligence (q), for the manner in which the stevedore performs his work (r), and also to the stevedore for his charges (s). The shipowner's liability is not taken away by a provision in the charterparty that the stevedore is to be appointed by the charterer, since the shipowner's duty to load the cargo remains, notwithstanding the charterer's failure to appoint any stevedore (t), and the mere fact that the charterer is to appoint the stevedore is not inconsistent with the existence of the relation of master and servant between the shipowner and the stevedore when appointed (a). As regards a shipper other than the charterer, this is clearly the case (b). Even as regards the charterer himself, the position appears to be the same (c). He is not liable to pay demurrage or damages for detention if the loading is delayed beyond the proper time through the negligence or default of a stevedore although the stevedore is nominated by him, on the ground that the stevedore is, nevertheless, the shipowner's servant (d); and it seems therefore that the charterer is entitled, on the same ground, charterer's agent for this purpose (The Figlia Maggiore (1868), L. R. 2 A. & E. 106).

(n) See p. 205, ante.

(o) The same principle applies where, owing to the method adopted, the ship is unable to carry the full quantity contracted for (Hovill v. Stephenson (1830), 4 C. & P. 469). A mere permission to load in a particular manner does not relieve the shipowner from the consequences of negligent stowage (Hutchinson v. Guion (1858), 5 C. B. (N. S.) 149).

(p) Where third persons are injured by the negligence of the stevedore's servants, the stevedore (Burns v. Poulsom (1873), L. R. 8 C. P. 563), and not the shipowner (Murray v. Currie (1871), L. R. 6 C. P. 24), is, as a general rule, responsible; see, further, titles MASTER AND SERVANT, Vol. XX., pp. 65, note (e), 149, 267; NEGLIGENCE, Vol. XXI, p. 472, note (i).

to hold the shipowner responsible if the goods are improperly stowed by the stevedore acting as the shipowner's servant (e). The charterparty may, however, provide not merely that the stevedore is to be appointed by the charterer, but also that he is to be employed and paid by him (f). The stevedore is then to be regarded as the servant of the charterer, who is, therefore, not entitled to hold the shipowner responsible for improper stowage (g). On the contrary, he is himself responsible to the shipowner for any loss or damage which the shipowner may suffer in consequence of improper stowage, unless the charterparty contains a stipulation exempting him from responsibility in such a case (h); and he is also responsible to the owners of any goods shipped which may be injured by reason of the improper stowage (i).

SUB-SECT. 4.—The Measure of Damages (a).

Failure to provide cargo.

296. The charterparty may contain a provision for the payment of a specified sum as liquidated damages where the charterer, without lawful excuse, fails to provide the cargo stipulated for (b). In the absence of any such provision, or where the sum specified is to be regarded as a penalty (c), the damages are unliquidated (d), and

Ch., the action was brought against the master, and it was held that he was not responsible, as the stevedore was not his servant, but the view was expressed that the stevedore might be the shipowner's servant though appointed by the charterer. In The Catherine Chalmers (1874), 32 L. T. 847, the court professed to follow Blaikie v. Stembridge, supra, and held the shipowner not to be responsible, though the charterparty expressly provided that the stowage was to be at the shipowner's risk; but it is submitted that the decision was incorrect; compare The Ferro, [1893] P. 38.

But if the charterer is afterwards reimbursed the stevedore's expenses by the shipowner, the stevedore is to be deemed, at least as regards shippers other than the charterer, to be the shipowner's servant (Sandeman v. Scurr (1866), L. SECT. 3. The Loading.

the measure of damages is the estimated amount of freight which would have been earned if the charterer had provided the cargo (e), less an allowance for the expenses which would have been incurred in earning it (f). A further allowance must be made if the ship has been able to find other employment, in respect of any profit arising out of such employment (g); if such profit is greater than the profit which would have been earned under the charterparty, the damages will be nominal only (h).

Seeking other employment for the ship.

How far the shipowner is bound to seek for other employment or to accept it, if offered by the charterer or by a third person, is a question not free from doubt (i). Since a refusal on the part of the charterer to provide a cargo is not a final breach unless the shipowner elects to treat it as such, and the shipowner is therefore entitled to treat the charterparty, even after the refusal, as subsisting throughout the whole of the period allowed for loading (k), the charterer has no cause of complaint if the shipowner, during such period, declines to accept other employment from himself, since by accepting it the shipowner might be deemed to have exonerated and discharged the charterer from his original undertaking (l); nor is the shipowner, during the period allowed for loading, bound to seek or to accept employment elsewhere, since, by his acceptance of such employment, he clearly indicates an intention to treat the charterparty as discharged (m). Where, therefore, he obtains employment for his ship after the expiration of the period allowed for loading, at a rate of freight lower than that offered or obtainable previously, the allowance to be made is to be calculated with reference to the freight actually earned, and not the freight which would or might have been earned if he had elected to treat the charterparty as discharged by the charterer's refusal to load (n). Whether after the expiration of the period allowed for loading the shipowner is bound to find some employment for his ship, if possible, and whether the charterer is entitled to an allowance for the freight which might have been earned but for the shipowner's default in (e) Westland v. Robinson (undated), cited 2 Vern. 212; Abbot on Shipping, 5th ed., p. 200; 14th ed., p. 678. Where the charterparty provides for the loading of different classes of goods at the charterer's option at varying rates of freight, the average freight is to be taken calculated upon the usual quantity carried upon such voygaes (Thomas v. Clarke and Todd (1818), 2 Stark. 450).

(f) Smith v. M'Guire (1858), 3 H. & N. 554. It is no defence that the ship was afterwards lost on her voyage so that, if the goods had been loaded, no freight would have been earned (Stephenson v. Price (1784), 3 Doug. (K. B.) 353).

(g) Smith v. M'Guire, supra; Puller v. Staniforth (1809), 11 East, 232. No allowance is to be made where the contract expressly fixes a sum to be paid as liquidated damages (Bell v. Puller (1810), 2 Taunt. 285).

refusing other employment or in taking no steps to seek it, are questions to which different answers have been given (o). It is probable, upon the principle that in assessing the damages for a breach of contract regard must be had not only to what the injured party has done, but also to what he had the means of doing, and as a prudent man ought in reason to have done, to minimise his loss (p), that the shipowner is bound to do what is reasonable and to avail himself of any opportunity of employment that may present itself (q). The charterer must, in addition, pay any demurrage which may have accrued due before his refusal to load (r).

Failure to ship proper cargo.

297. If the charterer, without lawful excuse, ships a less quantity of goods than that required by the charterparty (s), or if the goods shipped are not in accordance with the charterparty (t), the measure of damages is the difference between the freight actually earned, including any profit earned by carrying the goods of third persons (u), and the freight that would have been earned if the charterer had fulfilled his obligation (a). Such damages are usually known as dead freight (b).

"Dead freight."

Failure to supply ship.

298. Where the shipowner, without lawful excuse, fails to load the goods stipulated for, whether by reason of the non-arrival of the ship within the period allowed for loading or otherwise, two

(o) It was suggested that he was not bound to seek for employment in Smith v. M'Guire (1858), 3 H. & N. 554, per MARTIN, B., at p. 567; and that he was bound to do so in Harries v. Edmonds (1845), 1 Car. & Kir. 686; Wilson v. Hicks (1857), 26 L. R. 10 Exch. 274. In Thompson v. Inglis (1813), 3 Camp. 428, it was held that the shipowner was not bound to wait after the day fixed in the charterparty for sailing, though the charterer offered him a cargo if the ship would wait, but, as the day fixed was the day when the convoy passed the port of loading, the risk of capture would have been increased if she had waited, and the course proposed was therefore not reasonable.

If on the charterer being unable to complete the loading the shipowner fills up the ship with his own goods, the charterer cannot afterwards claim them (Lidgett v. Williams (1845), 4 Hare, 456, 464).

SECT. 3. The Loading.

factors have to be taken into consideration in measuring the damages (c), namely:—

(1) The value of the ship to the charterer. The measure of damages is the estimated amount of bill of lading freight which the charterer would have been able to obtain from shippers at the port of loading if the ship had been available at the proper time, less the amount of the chartered freight (d). If he is compelled to charter another ship in order to carry out his engagements, and, in consequence of a rise in freight, has to pay a larger amount of freight, the measure of damages is the difference between the amount of freight actually paid and the chartered freight (e).

(2) The value of the goods to the charterer. If owing to the shipowner's default the charterer is compelled to pay a higher price to obtain a cargo than he would have had to pay if the ship had been available at the proper time, he may recover, in addition to any increased freight, the increase in the price of the cargo (f). If no ship is available at the port of loading, so that the charterer is unable to carry his goods to the port of discharge, the damages are to be measured, not by the freight, but by the market price of the goods at the port of discharge at the time when they should have arrived, less the price payable at the port of loading at the time when the loading should have taken place (g). If, however, the goods are afterwards brought in by another ship, their market price at the port of discharge at the time of arrival must be substituted for the price at the port of loading (h).

Partial failure.

299. The same principles are to be applied in measuring the damages where the shipowner loads part of the goods but fails to load them all (i). In this case the shipowner is nevertheless entitled to recover freight upon the quantity actually carried, and the charterer must counterclaim in respect of any right to damages for his failure to load (k).

Loss of profit.

300. The charterer is not, as a general rule, entitled to recover

(c) Where the contract provides for the payment of liquidated damages, the charterer need not prove actual damage (Sparrow v. Paris (1862), 7 H. & N. 594; compare Sharp v. Gibbs (1857), 1 H. & N. 801); but the sum stipulated for is not payable unless the shipowner is guilty of the particular default contemplated by the stipulation (Valente v. Gibbs (1859), 6 C. loss of profit (l). On the other hand, any extra profit which he has actually made must be taken into account (m).

SECT. 4.—The Voyage.

SUB-SECT. 1.—The Seaworthiness of the Ship.

Seaworthiness at commencement.

301. At the commencement of the voyage (n) the ship must be reasonably fit for accomplishing the service which the shipowner has engaged to perform (o). She must therefore be seaworthy, that is, fit to meet and undergo the perils of the sea and other incidental risks to which she must, of necessity, be exposed in the course of the voyage then about to be undertaken (p). It is not sufficient that she was seaworthy at the commencement of the loading (q), since the standard by which her seaworthiness (r) is to be measured is different (s). Nevertheless, the same principles are to be applied in determining whether the ship is seaworthy, namely, that she must be fit not only to put to sea, but also to carry to its destination the particular cargo which she has taken on board (t).

Fitness to encounter perils.

302. To render the ship seaworthy in the strict sense of the word she must, at the time of her departure, be in a fit state, as to repairs, equipment and crew, and in all other respects, to encounter the ordinary perils likely to be encountered on the particular voyage at the particular season of the year (u). She must, therefore, be tight, staunch and strong, and furnished with all tackle and apparel necessary for the intended voyage (a). Thus, there is clearly a breach of this condition if, at the time of sailing, she is in a leaky state (b), or insufficiently ballasted (c), or if her sails are rotten (d), or boilers defective (e), or if her ground tackle is inefficient (f). There is equally a breach of the condition where, though she is, at the time of her sailing, apparently efficient, she suffers from some defect which will show itself in the course of the voyage, so that she cannot, in fact, be regarded as efficient (g). Thus, she may not be furnished with a supply of coals (h), or provisions (i), or medicines (k), sufficient to last the whole voyage (l); her boilers may be filled with muddy water, which will ultimately, by depositing the mud and thus clogging the steam pipes, render the boilers useless (m); her port-holes may be open or insecurely fastened, so that, although there may be no immediate danger, a change of weather will enable the sea to gain access to the cargo by entering the open port-holes or bursting the fastenings (n). The existence of any such defect is not, however, necessarily to be regarded as proof of unseaworthiness (o). A defect which is of a temporary nature only (p), or which is of a trivial character capable of being put right in a few minutes, such as, for instance, a cabin port-hole left open at the time of sailing (q), cannot reasonably be said to render the ship unfit to encounter the perils of the voyage (r). She is therefore seaworthy in spite of the defect, and it is immaterial that the defect is not in fact put right; in that case there is negligence on the part of the crew, but not unseaworthiness of the ship (s). If, on the other hand, the defect, though trivial, cannot be put right during the voyage, the ship is not in a fit state to encounter the perils of the voyage, and is therefore unseaworthy (t).

T. 163; Gilroy, Sons & Co. v. Price & Co., [1893] A. C. 56. The same principle applies where a ship is chartered under a time charter (Tully v. Howling (1877), 2 Q. B. D. 182, C. A.; Hogarth v. Miller, [1891] A. C. 48).

SECT. 4. The Voyage.

Adequate crew etc.

303. The ship must also be furnished with an adequate number of persons of competent skill and ability to navigate her (a). It is therefore necessary to take into consideration the length of the voyage and the circumstances in which it is undertaken (b). A ship may be unseaworthy, though her complement is in all other respects adequate, if her mates are not competent navigators, so that in the event of any accident to the master there is no one else on board capable of performing his duties (c). Similarly, where it is required by usage or the laws of the country that a pilot should be employed to take charge of the ship until she reaches the open sea (d), a pilot must, if available, be taken on board (e). The ship must also have on board all papers and documents necessary for the protection of the ship and cargo (f) and for the due performance of the voyage, such as, for instance, her bill of health (g) and manifest (h); but the absence of a document, such as a certificate of stowage given at the port of loading, which is not a necessary document, does not prevent the ship from fulfilling the contract, and does not, therefore, render her unseaworthy (i).

Stowage etc. of cargo.

304. A ship which is otherwise seaworthy may be rendered unseaworthy by reason of the presence of her cargo on board (k). It is essential that she should be fit to encounter the perils of the voyage as a laden ship (l). A ship cannot, therefore, be regarded as seaworthy if she is overloaded at the time of her departure (m), or if she carries on deck goods which, having due regard to the safety of the ship, ought not to be carried there (n). Similarly, the ship may be rendered unseaworthy owing to the method in which the cargo is stowed (o). A defect which might otherwise be put right, such as, for instance, an insecurely fastened port-hole, may be concealed and rendered inaccessible by the cargo being piled against it (p); or goods of a bulky nature, such as armour-plates, may be improperly stowed, so that, owing to the movement of the ship in a heavy sea, they fetch away and break through the side of the ship, thus causing her to sink with the rest of her cargo (q).

Fitness to carry cargo.

305. The ship must, in addition, be fit to carry the particular cargo shipped (r). It is not sufficient that, at the time of the loading (s), she was fit to receive it: the condition of seaworthiness is not satisfied unless she is equally fit, at the time of her departure, to contain it and preserve it from harm (t). Thus, the particular articles making up the cargo must be properly stowed so that they cannot break loose and suffer loss or damage (a); and there must be no goods on board, even though they may have been shipped afterwards, which, from their nature, will be likely to endanger the goods in respect of which the question of seaworthiness arises (b). Moreover, the ship must be free from defects which, though not endangering the safety of the ship herself, yet endanger the safety of the cargo by permitting the sea to have access to the cargo (c) or otherwise (d).

Voyage in stages.

306. Where the voyage is divided into stages, either naturally (e) or by agreement between the parties (f), the condition as to seaworthiness is sufficiently fulfilled if the ship, upon entering upon any particular stage of the voyage, is seaworthy for that stage; she need not necessarily be fit, at that time, to perform the whole voyage (g). Thus, if her course lies partly by canal or river and partly by sea, the ship is to be considered as seaworthy if, on leaving the river port, she is fit to encounter the usual perils of navigating the river, and it is not necessary that she should then be fit to put to sea (h). She must, however, on reaching the sea, be seaworthy in the full sense of the word; otherwise there is at the time when she actually puts to sea a breach of the condition, notwithstanding the fact that she was on leaving port seaworthy for the earlier portion of the voyage (i). Similarly, where the ship must necessarily, in the course of her voyage, encounter ice, she need not, on starting, be adequately strengthened and equipped for the purpose, if it is the usual practice of ships proceeding on that particular voyage to visit a port of call before reaching the latitudes where ice may be expected, and to furnish themselves there with the requisite strengthening and equipment; but she must, on leaving such usual port of call, be fitted to encounter ice (k). In accordance with the same principle, a steamship which is bound for a distant port is not unseaworthy because she has not on board a sufficient supply of coal to take her to her destination, provided that it is the usual practice to coal on the way (l), or it is agreed between the parties that she may do so (m). On leaving port, however, she must have on board sufficient coal to take her to the next port of call (n).

Commencement of each stage.

Where the voyage is in stages, a ship which at starting was seaworthy for the whole voyage must nevertheless continue to be seaworthy at the commencement of each and every subsequent stage (o); and there is therefore a breach of the condition as to seaworthiness if she commences any stage in an unseaworthy state, in spite of the fact that her unseaworthiness arises after she has started upon her voyage (p). Thus, a ship which has liberty to (o) If, therefore, in the course of the voyage she comes within a compulsory pilotage district, the voyage through that district is to be regarded as a separate stage, and she is therefore unseaworthy if she improperly fails to have a pilot on board (Law v. Hollingsworth (1797), 7 Term Rep. 160, as explained in Hollingworth v. Brodrick (1837), 7 Ad. & El. 40, per PATTESON, J., at p. 44).

SECT. 4. The Voyage.

call at various ports may be seaworthy on sailing from her first port, but may become unseaworthy afterwards by overloading at a later port; in this case there is a breach of the condition when she leaves such later port (q).

Extent of duty.

307. The duty of the shipowner to provide a seaworthy ship is absolute (r). He warrants the fitness of his ship when she sails, and not merely that he will honestly and bonâ fide endeavour to make her fit (s). He is therefore responsible for any latent defect the existence of which renders the ship unseaworthy (t), and it is immaterial that he has done his best to provide an efficient ship and that the defect could not have been detected by any reasonable means before it actually showed itself (a). At the same time the shipowner's duty does not extend to providing a perfect ship and one that can never, without the happening of some extraordinary peril, break down (b). There is no positive or fixed standard of seaworthiness (c); seaworthiness in any particular case is to be measured by the nature of the ship concerned and by the kind of adventure in which she is engaged (d). All that is necessary is that the ship should possess that degree of fitness to encounter the perils of the voyage which it would be usual and prudent and as of course to require at the commencement of the voyage (e); and if it appears that a prudent owner would never have sent the ship to sea without remedying the defect if he had known of its existence, a ship that puts to sea with the defect unremedied must be regarded as unseaworthy (f). It therefore follows that the standard of seaworthiness rises as progress is made in shipbuilding (g), and the shipowner does not fulfil his duty unless his ship is reasonably equipped with modern improvements (h). Nevertheless, as seaworthiness is merely a relative term (i), the character of the particular ship as known to the parties must be taken into consideration (k). If she is reasonably efficient for the voyage, the shipowner has fulfilled his duty to supply a seaworthy ship; and on the loss of the ship he is not rendered responsible merely by proof that a stouter ship would have outlived the peril (l).

Time when seaworthiness necessary.

308. The time at which the condition must be fulfilled is at the commencement of the voyage (m), that is, when the ship leaves her moorings without the intention of returning to them (n). If she is seaworthy at that time, the fact that she subsequently becomes unseaworthy is no breach of the condition, since it is no part of the contract that she shall continue to be seaworthy (o). On the other hand, if she is unseaworthy at the time of her departure, the shipowner cannot, by subsequent repair, escape the consequence of the breach of condition, and it is immaterial that the ship may in fact have been made thoroughly seaworthy before the loss or damage takes place (p).

Effect of unseaworthiness.

309. The consequences of a breach of condition are that the shipowner becomes responsible for all loss or damage which is attributable to the unseaworthiness of his ship (q), and that, in the absence of a special exception covering unseaworthiness at starting (r), he cannot rely for his protection upon any of the exceptions in the contract as covering the cause of the unseaworthiness (s). Thus, if the ship was unseaworthy owing to the fact that she started with an insufficient supply of coal, the shipowner cannot rely upon a negligence clause in the contract and escape responsibility on the ground that it was through the negligence of his servants that the coals were insufficient at starting (t), or that no call was made at a usual coaling station, thereby rendering his ship unseaworthy when she entered upon a new stage of the voyage (a). Similarly, where a port-hole has been left open or insecurely fastened in circumstances amounting to unseaworthiness (b), the shipowner is responsible if sea water gains access to the cargo and damages it; he is not excused either by an exception against perils of the sea (c) or even by an exception against negligence (d). The failure to provide a seaworthy ship does not, however, preclude the shipowner in every case of loss or damage from relying upon an exception; he remains covered except in so far as the loss or damage is attributable to unseaworthiness (e).

Burden of proof.

310. The burden of proving unseaworthiness rests upon the shipper (f). The fact, however, that the ship becomes leaky or goes to the bottom shortly after putting to sea, without there being any storm or other external circumstances to account for the condition or loss, is primâ facie evidence of unseaworthiness, and shifts upon the shipowner the burden of proving that she was in fact seaworthy at the time of her departure (g).

SUB-SECT. 2.—The Prosecution of the Voyage.

Obtaining clearances etc.

311. When the loading is completed and all things are prepared for the commencement of the voyage, it is the duty of the master to obtain the necessary clearances, or permission to sail, from the proper officer at the port of loading (h), and, except where, by the terms of the charterparty, the charterer has undertaken to do so (i), to pay the necessary port and other charges for that purpose (k), including light dues, when payable (l). Until this duty has been performed, the ship is not ready to commence her voyage (m).

(i) A charterer who has undertaken to pay all "port charges" is not bound to pay pilotage dues (Whittal & Co. v. Rahtken's Shipping Co., Ltd., [1907] 1 K. B. 783); compare London Transport Co., Ltd. v. Bessler, Waechter & Co., Ltd. (1908), 24 T. L. R. 531, H. L., where the contract provided for payment by the steamer of customs dues on the cargo, not exceeding a certain limit, and it was held that the limitation thereby imposed did not extend to an export tax, which the shipowner was therefore bound to pay. The charterer may similarly undertake to pay "dock dues," which include all proper charges which can be and are imposed by the dock authority in respect of the entrance into and use of the dock by the ship (The Katherine (1913), 30 T. L. R. 52).

Sailing from port.

312. Upon obtaining his clearances, it is the duty of the master to commence the voyage without delay (n). Where no time is specified for the ship's departure, the master is bound to start within a reasonable time (o). He need not, therefore, put to sea at once, if the weather is unpropitious, considering the nature of the ship, but may wait until the weather moderates (p). If, however, the master has no lawful excuse for his delay in starting, the shipowner is liable to the shipper for the consequences (q), since the shipper's duty is fulfilled when the loading is completed (r), and all risk of subsequent delay falls upon the shipowner (s). The shipowner is therefore responsible for any delay occasioned by the master's failure to obtain clearance at an earlier date, even though such failure is attributable to circumstances beyond the master's control (a), or by the inability of the ship to proceed upon the voyage (b), unless the cause of such inability is covered by an exception (c).

What constitutes sailing.

313. Whenever the contract specifies the date at which the ship is required to commence her voyage, it becomes important to consider what acts on the part of the ship constitute the commencement of the voyage, since a failure to commence the voyage on the due date is a breach of contract for which the shipowner is responsible, unless excused by an exception (d). The point is also important in connexion with the payment of advanced freight (e), which is usually made payable on the final sailing of the ship from her port of loading (f) or so many days afterwards (g), since, if the ship is lost, after the completion of the loading, but before she has finally sailed, the shipowner will not be entitled to recover even the advanced freight (h). To constitute a final sailing for this purpose (i) it is not sufficient that the ship should have her clearances on board and be ready to sail (k), or even that she has left her moorings or broken ground (l); she must have taken her final departure from her port of loading (m), and must be at sea, outside the limits of the port in the strict sense of the word (n), ready to proceed upon her voyage (o). It is not necessary that she should be progressing under her own sail and steam, since she may be in charge of a tug (p); nor need she be making progress at all, since she may cast anchor in a roadstead outside for the purpose of awaiting more favourable weather (q): she has, nevertheless, got clear of the port for the purpose of proceeding on the voyage, and she has therefore finally sailed within the meaning of the contract (r). Since, at the time of her departure, she had no intention of returning, it is immaterial that she is afterwards compelled to return to the port of loading or is driven within its limits by stress of weather (s). If, however, the ship, at the time when she leaves the port, is not ready to proceed upon the voyage, either because she is not fully equipped or properly manned (t), or because the bills of lading have not been signed (a), or her clearances obtained (b), and if she leaves the port with the intention of anchoring (c) or waiting outside (d) until the necessary preparations have been completed, the fact that she has got clear of the port without any intention of returning does not constitute a final sailing, since she is not at that moment in a position to proceed (e). If, therefore, she is lost before such preparations are completed, no advance freight is payable (f).

Proceeding without delay.

314. After commencing the voyage, it is the duty of the master, except in so far as he has some lawful excuse (g), to proceed to the port of discharge without delay, and without calling at any intermediate port, or deviating from the ordinary course of navigation (h).

Keeping ship seaworthy.

315. It is the duty of the master, as representing the shipowner, to carry the goods to the port of discharge in the same bottom (i), though, in the execution of this duty, he must consider the interests of all persons concerned in the adventure (k). He must therefore, as far as possible, maintain the ship in a seaworthy condition throughout the voyage (l), and if she becomes unseaworthy must execute any repairs which may be necessary, provided that he has a reasonable opportunity of doing so without any great delay or expense to the various interests involved (m). If the master fails to perform his duty in this respect, the shipowner is responsible to the owners of the goods on board his ship (n), except in so far as he may be excused by the terms of the contract (o). Even where the unseaworthiness is caused by an excepted peril, it is the duty of the master to remedy it by every reasonable means in his power (p); otherwise he is guilty of negligence, and the shipowner is not excused, unless he is protected by the terms of his contract against the consequences of the master's negligence (q). Thus, where the actual safety of the ship, and consequently of the cargo, is endangered, it is the duty of the master, if possible, to save his ship by removing the cause of danger, as, for instance, by stopping up a leak (r), or keeping down the water in the holds by pumping (s), or by returning to the port of loading or proceeding to a port of refuge for the purpose of executing the necessary repairs (t). Since, however, a mere error of judgment is not equivalent to negligence, the master is not guilty of negligence in continuing his voyage without putting into a port for repairs, if he honestly believes that the ship, in spite of her condition, is capable of reaching her destination, and it is immaterial that she in fact founders before she does so (a). When once she has reached a port of refuge, she must not, whatever may be the cause of her unseaworthiness, proceed to sea again in an unseaworthy condition (b); otherwise the shipowner is responsible, whether the original cause of her unseaworthiness is covered by an exception or not, since the master, in leaving the port of refuge without repairing, is guilty of negligence (c), and, moreover, the ship, if she has called at the port of refuge pursuant to liberty reserved in the contract, is to be regarded, on her departure, as entering upon a new stage of her voyage, for which she must, in the ordinary course, be seaworthy (d).

SECT. 4. The Voyage.

Master's power over cargo.

316. For the purpose of ensuring the due prosecution of the voyage and of maintaining the ship in a seaworthy condition, the master has certain powers over the cargo, the exercise of which, however, is subject to various restrictions (e). He may, where the circumstances of the particular case justify it, sacrifice the whole or a portion of the cargo for the purpose of preserving the ship and the rest of the cargo, by jettisoning goods to lighten the ship or by burning them to enable the fires to be kept up under the boilers (f). He may sell a portion (g), but not the whole (h), of the cargo for the purpose of raising funds to defray the expenses of such repairs as may be necessary to enable the ship to complete the voyage (i), and for the same purpose he may hypothecate even the whole of the cargo (k). No portion of the cargo, however, must be sold or hypothecated unless the master is unable to raise funds in any other way (l), and unless there is a prospect of benefit, direct or indirect, to the owners of the cargo (m).

Transhipment.

317. If the ship is disabled from continuing her voyage, the master is entitled to tranship the cargo and convey it upon another ship to its destination (n). If he is unable or unwilling to do so, he may abandon the voyage, in which case the owner of the cargo is entitled to claim delivery of his cargo at the place where the voyage is abandoned (o). Except, however, where the failure to continue the voyage is attributable to some excepted peril, the shipowner is guilty of a breach of contract, since he has engaged to convey the cargo to its destination, and the owner of the cargo is entitled to recover any damages which he may have sustained (p). Even where the ship is damaged by an excepted peril, the shipowner is not necessarily absolved, since he is bound to fulfil his engagement by every reasonable and practicable method (q). Hence the ship cannot be regarded as having been rendered by an excepted peril incapable of performing her voyage merely because, in consequence of such peril, she wants repairing (r) and cannot continue her voyage until she is repaired (s). It therefore becomes important to consider how far the shipowner is bound to repair his ship, since, if he does not repair her and abandons the voyage, the question may arise whether his inability to carry the cargo to its destination is to be attributed not to prevention by an excepted peril for which he is not responsible, but to his failure to repair, which is a breach of his duty towards the owner of the cargo (t). There is clearly a prevention by an excepted peril where the ship is so damaged that she cannot be repaired (a), or where, though she is capable of being repaired, there are no facilities for repairing her at the port of refuge (b). On the other hand, the shipowner is bound to repair the ship if it is reasonably possible for him to do so (c), and a failure to repair her, by which she is prevented from continuing her voyage, is not a prevention by an excepted peril (d). The cost of repairs, however, falls upon the shipowner (e), unless the need for repairs is occasioned by a general average loss (f); and if the cost is so prohibitive that he cannot prudently and reasonably repair, he cannot be called upon to do so (g). If the cost of the repairs necessary to enable the ship to complete her voyage is out of all proportion to the benefit which the shipowner will derive from them, it is impossible, in a business sense, to repair her (h), and the shipowner is therefore prevented from completing the voyage not by his failure to repair, but by an excepted peril (i). The cost of repairs must, however, be in fact unreasonable; the shipowner is not excused for a failure to repair because the master believed that the repairs could not be executed at a reasonable cost (k). In any case, whatever may be the cost of repairs, it is the duty of the shipowner to continue the voyage if he has in fact repaired the ship (l).

Seeking port of refuge.

318. Where the master is compelled to seek a port of refuge for the purpose of repairing the ship, he is not necessarily guilty of a deviation because he does not make for the nearest port; he is entitled to take into consideration the relative merits of different ports as regards their facilities for dealing with the ship or cargo, and may select that port which is, in his opinion, the most suitable (m).

SUB-SECT. 3.—The Preservation of the Cargo.

Extent of shipowner's duties.

319. In so far as the shipowner is in the position of an insurer (n), it is unnecessary to consider his duties in respect of the custody and protection of the cargo during the voyage, since he is absolutely responsible for its safety (o). He is therefore equally liable to its owner in case of its loss or damage, whether caused by the failure of himself or his servants to exercise due care (p) or by some peril wholly beyond his control (q). The existence of a special contract containing exceptions modifies the extent of his liability (r); but he remains, as before, liable for all loss or damage not attributable to an excepted peril (s). Where, however, the question arises whether or not the loss or damage is to be attributed to an excepted peril, the nature and extent of the shipowner's duties must be taken into account (a). In the absence of any express provision in the contract to the contrary (b), he is responsible to the cargo owner for the due performance of such duties, and is not protected by the terms of his contract if the loss or damage might, in spite of the happening of an excepted peril, have been avoided had such duties been duly performed (c).

Taking care of cargo.

320. It is the duty of the master, as representing the shipowner (d), to take reasonable care of the goods entrusted to him (e). The extent of this duty varies according to the nature of the goods and the circumstances of the particular case (f). If the goods, from their nature, require airing or ventilating, as in the case of a fruit cargo, he must take the usual and proper methods for the purpose (g). If they are capable of being damaged by water, he must keep the water away from them by pumping the holds clear of drainage (h), or by battening down the hatches during heavy weather (i), or by taking any other measures that may be reasonably required (k). Similarly, if they are capable of being stolen during the voyage, he must protect them against theft (l). For loss or damage attributable to the master's failure to perform this duty the shipowner is responsible, in spite of an exception covering the actual cause of such loss or damage (m), since, if the goods heat through lack of ventilation (n), or are damaged by water (o), or are stolen (p) through the master's negligence in taking care of them, the efficient (q) cause of the loss or damage is not the heating, or the peril of the sea, or the theft, for all of which there may by the terms of the contract be no responsibility, but the master's negligence (r). Where, on the other hand, the master has taken all reasonable precautions to preserve the goods, the fact that, notwithstanding such precautions, the goods are lost or damaged, does not preclude the shipowner from relying upon the exceptions of his contract (s); and the same principle applies where the master is prevented, by the happening of an excepted peril, from carrying out his duties, as, for instance, where he is prevented from ventilating

SECT. 4. The Voyage.

the cargo by a storm (t). Even where the loss or damage is attributable to the precautions actually adopted by the master, as, for instance, where in a storm goods are jettisoned (a), or the cargo heats owing to the hatches being battened down (b), the fact that such precautions were rendered necessary by an excepted peril must be taken into consideration, and the excepted peril, and not the master's act, must be regarded as the efficient cause (c).

Checking deterioration.

321. It is the duty of the master not merely to do what is necessary to preserve the goods on board his ship during the ordinary incidents of the voyage, but also to take reasonable measures to check and arrest their loss, destruction, or deterioration through accidents, for the necessary effects of which there is, by reason of an exception in the contract, no original liability upon the shipowner (d); and for the master's failure to perform this part of his duty the shipowner is equally responsible (e). In considering what measures are reasonable, it is not sufficient to point to the fact that the goods have been lost or damaged, and to suggest measures which might have been taken to prevent them being so lost or damaged (f); it is necessary to take into account all circumstances affecting the risk, trouble, delay and inconvenience, and in particular the place, the season, the extent of the deterioration, the opportunity and means at hand, and the interests of other persons concerned in the adventure, which it might be unfair to prejudice for the sake of the part of the cargo in peril (g). It must be shown that the measures suggested would have been reasonable and prudent to take in the interest of the shipper, and would in fact have been taken by him if the whole adventure had been under his control and at his risk (h), and in addition that there is nothing in the circumstances of the case indicating any special risk, trouble, inconvenience, or other objection (i). Moreover, the liability of the shipowner does not necessarily depend upon the result of the measures actually taken by the master (k). A fair allowance must be made for the difficulties in which the master may be involved.

It must be borne in mind that he is to exercise a discretionary power, and no liability arises unless it can be affirmatively proved that he has been guilty of a breach of duty (l). At the same time the question whether the shipowner is or is not liable does not depend upon the master's honest belief that what he proposes to do is the right thing; the master must consider the interest not merely of the ship, but of the whole adventure, and act accordingly (m).

Preventing damage from spreading.

322. In the performance of this part of his duty the master must, if the goods suffer damage in the course of the voyage, endeavour to save them, and must, as far as possible, by pumping or using other proper means, prevent the damage from spreading (n). He is not, however, bound to seek a port of refuge as soon as it becomes clear that by going on some mischief will be done to some portion of the cargo, especially if such a course will put all concerned to enormous expense (o), and the ship remains in a fit condition to continue her voyage (p). The performance of this duty, whether it is for the joint benefit of the shipowner and the cargo owner, or for the benefit of the cargo owner only, cannot be insisted on if a deviation is involved (q). Nevertheless, in considering the question whether a deviation is justifiable or not (r), the interests of the cargo as well as of the ship may be taken into account as influencing the master's decision (s). Moreover, reasonable delay at a port of call for purposes connected with the voyage, though not necessary for its completion, does not amount to deviation (t). If, therefore, the ship puts into a port of call or seeks a port of refuge, where an opportunity of coping with the mischief presents itself, the master is entitled to make use of the opportunity, if it is possible to do so without unreasonably delaying the ship (a). In fact, as regards the owner of the particular goods affected, it is his duty to make use of it if possible, otherwise the shipowner is responsible for the consequences of the master's breach of duty (b). Thus, if it is reasonably possible to remedy the mischief by landing the goods promptly, the master must land them at once, and the shipowner is responsible for any damage occasioned to the goods by their being kept on board, even though the original cause of the damage to them is covered by an exception (c). The master must, in addition, take any other reasonable measures that may be necessary, either by way of drying the goods (d) or otherwise (e), for the purpose of checking the deterioration and rendering the goods fit to be carried on (f). The master's duty in this behalf is not confined to cases of physical damage and deterioration; if from any cause whatever it becomes dangerous to carry the goods on, as for instance where they are contraband of war, so that, if he had continued the voyage with the goods on board, he would have been acting recklessly, it is his duty to land them and to place them in safe custody (g). In any case in which the whole of the cargo may be in danger of being lost, it is the duty of the master to save the most valuable portion of the cargo first, if it is possible to do so without unreasonably neglecting the interests of the owners of the other portions of the cargo (h).

Master's implied authority on behalf of cargo owner.

323. Though, in dealing with the cargo for the purpose of preserving it from harm, the master acts as agent of the shipowner, so as to render the shipowner liable for his breach of duty, he has also an implied (i) authority in cases of accident and emergency to deal with the cargo on its owner's behalf, and for the protection of his interests to act for the safety of the cargo in the best manner possible in the circumstances in which it is placed (j). In the exercise of this authority he may jettison a portion of the cargo (k), or enter into a salvage agreement in respect of it (l); he may make arrangements for drying the cargo at a port of refuge and fitting it to be carried on (m); if in his opinion it is unsafe to carry it on, he may warehouse it (n) or even sell it (o). These acts are done by the master in his capacity as agent of the cargo owner, and it is therefore the cargo owner and not the shipowner who is bound by them, and who must accept responsibility for them (p). Since, however, the master's authority to act on the cargo owner's behalf is only an implied authority, arising where the circumstances of the particular case justify it, whilst his authority to act on the shipowner's behalf is a general authority, he cannot bind the cargo owner by an improper exercise of his authority (q), and the shipowner accordingly remains responsible (r).

Justifiable exercise of master's authority:

324. To justify the master in exercising his implied authority on behalf of the cargo owner the following conditions must be fulfilled (s), namely:—

(1) when necessary;

(1) It must be reasonably necessary, from the circumstances of the case, that the master should deal with the cargo in some way or other on its owner's behalf (t). The necessity must arise, not through the act of persons with whom the master is connected (a), but through the force of circumstances, by reason of the events that have happened, casting upon him the duty of acting on the cargo owner's behalf (b), because the cargo must not be left to perish or left unguarded or uncared for, and there is no one else who can perform the duty of guarding the cargo or taking care of it, or doing the best with it, except the master (c). Moreover, the necessity must involve the interests of the cargo owner: the mere necessity of the ship, apart from the adventure, does not entitle the master to act on behalf of the cargo owner (d).

(2) where reasonable course adopted;

(2) The course adopted by the master of dealing with the cargo must have been reasonably necessary in the circumstances of the case (e). The mere fact that, in consequence of the events that have happened, something must be done with the cargo, and the master is therefore compelled to decide between alternative courses, does not, in itself, bind the cargo owner to accept the course which is actually adopted (f). It is not sufficient to show that the master thought that he was doing his best, or even that the course adopted was, so far as can be ascertained, the best (g) for all concerned (h). It may have been a reasonable course (i), it may be clear that the cargo might have suffered further damage if the master had not acted as he did (k); nevertheless, it may not have been the proper course to adopt (l). To bind the cargo owner it must be shown that, in dealing with the goods, the master has adopted the course which, according to the judgment of a wise and prudent man, is apparently the best for the persons for whom he acts in the emergency which has arisen (m).

(p) See pp. 240, 247, 250, post. The master, it seems, has a lien on the cargo for his expenses (Hingston v. Wendt (1876), 1 Q. B. D. 367, per BLACKBURN, J., at p. 373).

(3) where communication impossible.

(3) The master must be unable to communicate with the owner of the cargo in time to receive his instructions before dealing with the cargo (n). It is the duty of the master to communicate with the owner of the cargo, unless it is impossible to do so owing to the urgency of the case, as where there is danger of an immediate loss unless prompt measures are taken to remedy the mischief (o). In considering whether communication is possible, the cost and risk incidental to the delay from the attempt to make such communication, and the probability of failure after every exertion should have been made, must be taken into account (p). Moreover, regard must be had to the means of communication available and to the prospect of obtaining an answer in time (q). The master must, therefore, employ the telegraph, where this can usefully be done; but the state of the particular telegraph, the way in which it is managed, and how far explanatory messages can be transmitted by it, having regard to the time and circumstances in which the master is placed, are important factors in determining whether communication is possible (r). In addition, where the ship is a general ship, the position is modified by the circumstances that the cargo belongs to different owners and that the task of tracing out and communicating with them must add greatly to the master's labours, and might lead to the neglect of more pressing duties connected with the saving and dealing with the goods (s). These circumstances do not, however, in themselves absolve the master of a general ship from the duty of communicating with such owners of cargo as are known to him (t).

Where communication possible.

Where communication is possible, a master who fails to communicate with the owner of the cargo cannot bind him by his dealings with it, since his implied authority to act on its owner's behalf has never come into existence (a). He therefore remains the agent of the shipowner, and if he deals improperly with the cargo in the purported exercise of such authority, renders the shipowner liable for the consequences (b). On the other hand, if the owner of the cargo neglects to reply to the communication (c), or refuses to give instructions (d), the master's implied authority, if the circumstances otherwise justify its exercise, comes into existence, and he is entitled to take such steps as may appear to him to be reasonably necessary in the interests of the owner of the cargo. He cannot, however, disregard any instructions which he may receive, and it is immaterial that, in disregarding them, he acted bonâ fide and that the steps which he took were reasonable (e).

Expenses.

325. Wherever the master has implied authority to deal with the cargo on its owner's behalf, he is entitled to charge the owner with the expenses properly incurred in so doing (f), and, if necessary, he may exercise a lien over the cargo in respect of such expenses (g). He is also entitled to raise funds for the purpose of defraying such expenses by hypothecating the whole of the cargo (h), or by selling a portion of it (i), and may, in case of need, pledge the cargo owner's credit (k). He cannot, however, charge the cargo owner with such expenses as are properly payable by the shipowner (l).

SECT. 4. The Voyage.

Shipowner's liability.

326. Even though the master may not have been guilty of a breach of duty, either as regards the ship (m) or as regards the cargo (n), the shipowner is nevertheless liable for any loss or damage which the cargo (o) may sustain, unless the cause of the loss or damage is covered by an exception in the contract (p). To exempt the shipowner, it is not sufficient to prove that the loss or damage took place and that, at the same time, an excepted peril happened (q); he must show that the loss or damage was proximately caused by the excepted peril (r). Where there is only one cause to which the loss or damage can be attributed, the position of the shipowner depends merely upon the construction to be placed upon the language of the particular exception (s). If the language used is wide enough to include the actual cause of the loss, he is exempt from liability (t): if he has failed to include it, he remains liable (a). Thus, a cargo which is eaten by rats in the hold of a ship is not lost, within the meaning of an exception, either by a peril of the sea (b), or by the act of God (c). Where, however, there has been a succession at intervals of causes which must have existed in order to bring about the loss, the question arises as to which cause must be taken as the cause to which the loss is to be attributed (d). If there has been an interruption in the sequence of causes, the last cause alone is to be taken into consideration, and the others rejected, although the loss could not have been brought about without them (e). Thus, where a cargo is damaged owing to the fact that sea-water gains access to it through a hole in the ship's side, the damage is attributable, if no question of negligence on the part of the master or crew or seaworthiness of the ship arises, to a peril of the sea (f); and it is unnecessary to inquire into the cause of there being a hole through which the sea water is enabled to enter the ship (g). Though it is true that the water could not have entered in the absence of the hole, and that the damage therefore would not have happened if the cause which produced the hole had not operated, nevertheless, the immediate and proximate cause of the damage is the entrance of the water (h). The cause which produced the hole, whether it is a cannon-ball striking the ship (i), or a rat gnawing a pipe which communicates with the sea (k), must be disregarded as being only the remote cause of the damage. If, on the other hand, a cause other than the last cause continues to be in operation at the time when the loss takes place, it may become impossible to hold that the last cause only is the proximate cause of the loss to the exclusion of the other (l). Each may be as much a proximate cause of the loss as the other, and the preceding cause may in fact, for the purpose of an exception, be the efficient cause of the loss (m). Thus, where the water gains access to the cargo through a port-hole negligently left open (n), or through a hole intentionally bored in the side of the ship by the crew (o), any damage to the cargo, though, in one sense, attributable to a peril of the sea, namely, the entrance of the water, is equally attributable to the negligence which leaves the port-hole open, or to the wilful misconduct which seeks to scuttle the ship; and the shipowner cannot, therefore, rely upon the one proximate cause of the damage which is covered by an exception against perils of the sea, to the exclusion of the other cause, which falls outside this exception (p).

SECT. 4. The Voyage.

liabilities of the parties are affected by the transhipment of the cargo during the voyage, in order that it may be carried to its destination in another ship. For this purpose three kinds of transhipment must be distinguished, namely:—(1) Transhipment under an express term of the contract (r); (2) transhipment, after the ship has been disabled from continuing her voyage, in the interests of the shipowner (s); and (3) transhipment, after the voyage has been abandoned, in the interests of the cargo owner (t).

Transhipment under contract.

328. Where transhipment takes place in accordance with an express term of the contract, the rights and liabilities of the parties depend upon the construction and effect of the particular term employed (a). There may be a term in any contract of carriage giving the shipowner liberty at any port to tranship the goods and forward them by another ship (b). Such a term is convenient where, as is sometimes the case, the shipowner is by the contract given wide control over the movements of the ship (c). He may, in this case, even after the goods have been shipped and whilst the ship is on the way to the port of discharge, change her destination and give orders which will prevent her from calling at the port of discharge named in the contract (d). Nevertheless, the contract gives him the option of performing it by transhipment; he is not guilty of a breach of contract in ordering the ship to a different port and in sending on the goods to their original destination in another ship, and he may, therefore, notwithstanding the transhipment, rely for protection upon the exceptions of the original contract (e).

Through bills of lading.

A term relating to transhipment is usually contained in a through contract of carriage (f), under which transhipment is contemplated as a necessary step in the prosecution of the voyage upon which the goods are embarked (g). The general obligations of the shipowner with whom the through contract was made continue in force, notwithstanding the transhipment (h). A provision, therefore, that the goods are to be transhipped and forwarded at the shipper's risk is to be construed as throwing upon the shipper merely the risk arising out of and connected with the actual transhipment; it does not relieve the shipowner from the risks of the subsequent voyage (i), or from the duty of providing proper and suitable means of transhipment (j). If, however, the provision in the contract relates only to the forwarding of the goods, without mentioning transhipment, the risk of damage during transhipment remains with the shipowner, though he is not liable for damage occasioned subsequently, as, for instance, by negligent stowage upon the second ship (k). Moreover, the shipowner's obligation to use reasonable dispatch requires him to tranship the goods with due diligence (l); and, if he fails to do so, he is responsible to the shipper for the consequences of any delay that may ensue (m). His obligation in this behalf is not lessened by a provision in the contract by which he is allowed, at the shipper's risk and expense, to retain the goods at the port of transhipment until they can be forwarded; such a provision is intended to apply to the delay which is contemplated as incidental to the transhipment in the ordinary course of business, and not to a delay which the shipowner could have avoided by the reasonable performance of his duty (n).

Loss before transhipment.

On the other hand, the loss of the goods before transhipment does not entitle their owner to claim a return of any portion of the freight if paid in advance, since the contract is entire and the consideration for which the freight has been paid has been partly performed (o).

Transhipment to earn freight.

329. The fact that the ship is disabled by an excepted peril from continuing the voyage does not, in itself, entitle the master to tranship the goods and forward them to their destination by another ship (p), since it is his primary duty to complete the voyage in his own ship (q). He must, therefore, if it is reasonably possible, repair the ship so as to render her fit to proceed on the voyage (r); and when this is done, he may insist on reshipping the goods if they have been landed, for the purpose of completing the voyage (s). If, however, it is impossible to repair her because she is a wreck (a), or if owing to the extent of the damage which she has sustained she cannot be repaired without very great loss of time or without incurring an unreasonable expense (b), the master is prevented, ex hypothesi, by an excepted peril, from performing his duty; and he is, therefore, discharged from his obligation to repair the ship and to carry on the goods in the same bottom (c). Since, however, no freight is earned unless the goods are delivered by the shipowner at their port of destination (d), the master is at liberty, for the purpose of enabling the freight to be earned, to tranship the goods into another ship to be forwarded on account of the shipowner (e). It is not, however, it seems, the duty of the master, as representing the shipowner, to tranship the goods (f); and he cannot therefore be compelled to do so against his will (g). If he thinks fit, he may give up the attempt to forward the goods to their destination on the shipowner's behalf, and may abandon the voyage altogether (h). In this case he must deliver the goods to their owner at the place where they lie, and no freight will be payable (i), inasmuch as the condition upon which alone it becomes payable has not been performed, and has been rendered incapable of performance by the master's own act (k). At the same time, he is not bound to abandon the voyage; it is his right to tranship the goods for the purpose of earning the freight, if, in his opinion, such a course would be beneficial to the interests of the shipowner (l). The forwarding of the goods to their destination in this manner is deemed to be a fulfilment of the original contract (m). If, therefore, the master decides to exercise his right, the owner of the goods cannot require him to hand them over at the place where they lie, except upon the terms of paying the whole amount of the freight (n). If the master is able and willing to perform the contract in a manner in which he has a right to perform it, and if the condition upon which the freight becomes payable remains unperformed, its non-performance is attributable, not to any default on the part of the master, but to wrongful prevention by the owners of the goods (o).

330. The master is entitled to retain the goods in his possession, notwithstanding that their owner has demanded their delivery, for a reasonable time whilst he is considering what is the best course to adopt, whether he shall repair the ship, or forward the goods in another ship, or abandon the voyage (p). At the same time he has no right to sacrifice the interests of the owner of the goods to the interests of the shipowner; he must not neglect his duty as regards the preservation of the goods entrusted to his care (q). For the purpose of ascertaining, therefore, what is a reasonable time all the circumstances of the case must be taken into account, including any delay attributable to the interference of the authorities, whether judicial or administrative, at the place where the goods are lying (r). Moreover, the condition of the goods must be taken into consideration (s), and, if they are damaged owing to the master's failure to tranship them at an earlier date, the shipowner is responsible (t).

Original contract unaffected.

331. Where the master transhipps the goods in order that he may earn his freight, the original contract of carriage remains in force as between the shipowner and the owner of the goods until their final delivery at the port of discharge (a). The contract made by the master with the owner of the ship in which the goods are to be forwarded is made upon the original shipowner's behalf, and not by the master as agent for the owner of the goods (b). It is, therefore, a contract between the two shipowners, and does not affect the existing contractual rights of the owner of the goods (c). He remains liable to pay freight, when the goods arrive at their destination, to the shipowner with whom he originally contracted (d). He must pay freight at the original rate, and is not entitled to take advantage of the fact that the freight payable by the shipowner himself on the transhipment is at a lower rate (e). He cannot, therefore, claim to have his goods delivered to him on paying pro ratâ freight (f) at the original rate in respect of the portion of the voyage traversed before the transhipment, together with a sum equivalent to the actual freight payable under the contract of transhipment (g). The amount of freight payable by him is the full freight that would have been paid by him in the ordinary course if the voyage had not been interrupted (h), less any moneys advanced to the master of the original ship (i). On the other hand, the first shipowner remains bound by the terms of the original contract; he is, therefore, unless excused by such terms, responsible for the safe carriage of the goods to their destination (k), and cannot rely upon any exception contained in the contract of transhipment which is not already contained in the original contract (l).

Prevention of voyage.

332. The master is equally at liberty to tranship the goods for the purpose of earning his freight where the continuance of the voyage in the same bottom is prevented by some cause which is not within his or the shipowner's control and not excepted from the contract (m). If, however, he abandons the voyage the shipowner will be responsible to the owner of the goods for his failure to carry the goods to their destination, since the completion of the voyage is not prevented by a cause for which the shipowner is excused (n).

Transhipment on cargo owner's behalf.

333. Though transhipment, as a method of fulfilling the original contract in the interests of the shipowner, may prove impracticable on the ground of expense, as, for instance, where the freight payable under the contract of transhipment would exceed the full freight payable under the original contract (o), the master may, nevertheless, be entitled, as agent through necessity, to tranship the goods on their owner's behalf (p). His duty as regards the preservation of the goods does not come to an end with the abandonment of the voyage (q), and, though he has no longer any right to tranship the goods on the shipowner's behalf (r), it is still his duty to consider the interests of the owner of the goods (s). He must, therefore, land the goods and warehouse them until they can be delivered to their owner, or until their owner's instructions can be received (t). If, however, it is necessary to act promptly and there is no time or opportunity to consult the owner before deciding what course to take (a), the master may tranship the goods at once, without communicating with the owner, if, in the circumstances of the case, immediate transhipment is reasonably justifiable as being the most beneficial course to be taken in the interests of the owner of the goods (b). Thus, transhipment is justifiable where the goods are perishable (c), or where the ship is in danger of foundering when she is met by another ship to which they can be transferred (d). In this case the master enters into the contract of transhipment as agent of the owner of the goods and not as representing the shipowner (e). The owner of the goods is, therefore, bound by the terms of the contract, and may be liable to pay to the second shipowner freight at a rate higher than that reserved by the original contract (f). The master must, however, make a reasonable contract of transhipment; he has no general authority to represent the owner of the goods, and cannot bind him by a contract to pay freight at a rate exceeding the current rate at the port of transhipment (g); nor can he bind him to pay freight, even at the current rate, upon a larger quantity of goods than is, in fact, shipped. His authority is limited to the transhipment of the actual goods in his possession; and he cannot, therefore, contract on behalf of their owner to load a full cargo upon the ship which he has engaged, or, in the alternative, to pay dead freight (h). In accordance with the same principle, he has no authority to make false statements as to the quantity of goods to be transhipped (i).

Where the master tranships the goods on their owner's behalf, both he and the shipowner are, after the transhipment, free from further responsibility (k); and the shipowner cannot claim freight accruing due in respect of the transhipment (l).

SUB-SECT. 5.—Hypothecation of the Cargo.

Definition.

334. The master is entitled, subject to certain conditions (m), as agent of necessity on behalf of the cargo owner, to hypothecate the cargo (n) for the purpose of raising funds to enable him either to complete the voyage in the same bottom (o), or to forward the goods to their destination (p). By hypothecation of the cargo is meant a pledge of the cargo without immediate change of possession; it gives a right to the person making advances on the faith of it to have the possession of the goods if the advances are not paid at the stipulated time; but it leaves to the owner of the goods hypothecated the power of making such repayment, and thereby freeing them from the obligation (q). It is, therefore, contrary to the nature of the transaction, and consequently contrary to the duty and beyond the power of the master, to engage that the lender shall at all events have the goods delivered at their port of destination to him or his agents, to be there sold or disposed of by him or them, without reserving the right of redemption to their owner, and such an engagement will not be binding upon their owner, who will still have the right to take the goods upon payment of the money for which they may have been engaged (r). All that the hypothecation confers upon the lender is a maritime lien (s) enforceable against the cargo (a), and the cargo owner is not responsible beyond its value (b). Moreover, the transaction involves a maritime risk, that is to say, the repayment of the advance must depend upon the safe arrival of the cargo at its port of destination (c). To entitle the lender to payment in full of his advance, the whole of the cargo hypothecated must arrive; if only a portion arrives, owing to the rest being lost on the way, a proportionate part of the loss falls upon the lender, who is only entitled to be paid a proportionate amount of his advance; whilst if no cargo arrives at all, he loses the whole of his money (d).

335. Where the hypothecation applies to the cargo only, the contract is called respondentia (e); where, as is usually the case, the ship and freight are included, it is called a contract by bottomry (f). The instrument embodying the transaction is, as a general rule, in the form of a bond (g) or bill of sale (h). No particular form of instrument is, however, required, so long as the intention of the parties to undertake a maritime risk is clearly shown (i). This intention must appear on the face of the instrument; a verbal undertaking is not sufficient (k). Thus, a bill of exchange given by the master to the lender does not become an instrument of hypothecation, because the master at the same time enters into a verbal engagement that the cargo shall be bound (l). On the other hand, an instrument of hypothecation which is otherwise valid is not necessarily invalidated by the fact that it is intended to operate only as collateral security to a bill of exchange, since the mere existence of the bill of exchange is not inconsistent with the advance having been made upon the security of the cargo (m). Where the form of the instrument is ambiguous, the rate of interest payable under it may be taken into consideration; the fact that the lender charges only the rate of interest current for a land risk is evidence that he does not intend to undertake a maritime risk (n).

(e) The term is also applied to loans which are conditional on the safe arrival of the cargo, but under which the lender has only a personal remedy against the borrower, and has no claim against the goods, the instrument not containing any formal hypothecation of the cargo (Abbott on Shipping, 5th ed., p. 121; 14th ed., p. 191, citing 2 Bl. SECT. 4. The Voyage.

The master's authority to hypothecate the cargo probably exists only in the case of voyages from one country to another, and does not extend to coasting voyages (o).

When hypothecation justified.

336. To justify the master in hypothecating the cargo for the purpose of raising funds to enable him to complete the voyage the following conditions must be fulfilled, namely:—

Necessary expenditure.

(1) The expenditure for which the funds are required must be reasonably necessary for the completion of the voyage (p). Since the master's authority depends upon the necessity of the case, it must be shown that the actual expenditure incurred was justified by the circumstances (q). Thus, when the ship is in need of repair, necessity cannot justify repairs beyond the extent required to enable her to complete her voyage; he must not avail himself of the opportunity to get a great deal more work done than is actually required, in order that she may be reclassed (r); nor must he pay, even for the necessary repairs, at an exorbitant rate (s). He has, therefore, no authority to hypothecate the cargo for a larger sum than is reasonably necessary according to the ordinary course of prudent conduct (t). If, however, he does so, the hypothecation is not wholly inoperative, but remains valid to the extent to which money is needed for the actual necessities of the ship (a).

The master may hypothecate the cargo, in case of need, to pay for repairs (b) or supplies to his ship (c), or to cover disbursements incurred at a port of refuge (d). He is not entitled, however, to hypothecate the cargo to meet expenditure incurred on previous voyages (e).

Inability to raise funds otherwise.

(2) The master must be unable to procure funds in any other way (f). The necessity of the case which is required to justify hypothecation of the cargo is not restricted to the circumstances in which the expenditure was incurred, but extends to the method of procuring funds actually adopted (g). It is the master's duty, if possible, to borrow money upon the personal credit of the shipowner (h), or by hypothecation of the ship or freight (i), and if he has already succeeded in doing so by either method, he cannot afterwards hypothecate the cargo to secure repayment of any moneys so borrowed (k). Before a loan on the security of the cargo is justifiable, all other methods of raising money must have been exhausted; it must be shown that it is impossible to raise the money upon the personal credit of the shipowner, and that the security of the ship and freight is not sufficient for the advances which are, in the circumstances, required (l).

Interests of cargo involved.

(3) The expenditure must be necessary in the interests of the cargo as well as of the ship (m). It is the duty of the master to bear in mind that he represents both the shipowner and the cargo owner, and that he must sacrifice neither to the other, but must endeavour to hold the balance evenly between them both (n). His authority to hypothecate the cargo is based upon the prospect of benefit to the cargo owner (o). If the repairs to the ship, or other causes of expenditure, produce neither benefit nor a prospect of benefit to the cargo owner, the master's authority to pledge the credit of the cargo to meet such expenditure does not exist, and a hypothecation of the cargo for the purpose is therefore inoperative (p). On the other hand, the expenditure, whether upon repairs or otherwise, may still promote the preservation and conveyance of the cargo, although the prospect of benefit may be more direct and more immediate to the ship, and in this case it must be considered as incurred for the common benefit of both ship and cargo (q). The test to be applied in considering whether the hypothecation of the cargo was justifiable, is whether or not the cargo owner would have preferred to pay the full freight at the port of refuge and to reship the cargo at his own expense (r).

The master has no authority to hypothecate cargo which has never been put on board (s), unless the cargo owner is already under contract to ship it (t).

Inability to communicate.

(4) The master must have been unable to communicate with the cargo owner (a). His authority to hypothecate the cargo is founded upon the impossibility of communication (b), and does not therefore arise if there was a reasonable possibility of communicating with the cargo owner or with his representative (c). It is not sufficient for the master, in his communication, to give the cargo owner information that the ship has received damage and is in need of repairs, and that the cargo also may be damaged; he must specifically inform the cargo owner that it is necessary to hypothecate the cargo to obtain the requisite funds (d), or place before him circumstances from which the obvious and irresistible inference must be drawn that the hypothecation of the cargo is necessary (e). If he fails to give the cargo owner full information, the hypothecation cannot be justified on the ground that the master was left without instructions and acted for the best (f). If, on the other hand, ample information is placed before the cargo owner, not only as to the injuries to the ship, but also as to the damage to the cargo, and if his instructions are particularly and immediately requested, his failure to reply or to interfere in any way is to be regarded as acquiescence in the master's proceedings, and the master's authority to bind the cargo arises (g). Except, however, where it is necessary to act promptly and without delay, the master must not bind the cargo until sufficient time has elapsed to enable its owner to send instructions (h). On the other hand, the master has no authority to hypothecate the cargo against the express instructions of its owner (i).

If communication is impossible it is immaterial that the cargo owner resides in the country where the hypothecation takes place (La Ysabel (1812), 1 Dods. 273).

SECT. 4. The Voyage.

are exhausted (k); and it is immaterial that his security purports to cover the cargo only (l). The same principle applies where there have been several loans on bottomry, the earlier of which are secured on the ship and freight only, whilst the last of them is secured on the cargo also (m). The cargo owner is not concerned with the earlier securities (n), and there is no equity between him and their holders (o). He cannot, therefore, be required to pay anything under the last security, upon which alone he is liable, until after the ship and freight have been exhausted (p); nor will the assets be marshalled in favour of the holders of the earlier securities so as to leave a portion at least of the value of the ship or freight available for them (q).

The rights of the lender against the cargo are liable to be postponed in favour of claims against the cargo for salvage (r), the master's lien over the cargo for general average contributions (s), and freight payable in respect of the subsequent transhipment of the cargo (t).

Position of shipowner.

338. Though in hypothecating the cargo for the purpose of enabling repairs to be executed or of otherwise furthering the prosecution of the voyage the master is, as regards the lender of the money, the agent of necessity of the cargo owner (a), he acts as between the cargo owner and the shipowner exclusively as agent of the shipowner (b). He is clearly the shipowner's agent in ordering the repairs to be executed or other necessaries to be procured, since no other person but the shipowner or his agent can have any authority to do so; and the master, therefore, in borrowing the money requisite to pay for them, must necessarily act as agent of the shipowner and not as the agent of anyone else (c). The shipowner must, therefore, indemnify the cargo owner against any sums which he may have been compelled to pay to the lender in order to obtain his cargo (d), except in so far as the necessity for the loan arises out of a general average loss, and the expenditure is therefore to be apportioned between them (e).

Hypothecation on behalf of cargo owner.

339. Where the master incurs expenditure for the sole benefit of the cargo, he may equally have an implied authority to hypothecate it for the purpose of raising the requisite funds (f). The foundation of his authority is the necessity of the cargo, as, for instance, where the cargo has been damaged and requires to be dried or otherwise attended to (g), or where it is impossible to arrange for its transhipment on behalf of the cargo owner without funds (h). The general principles governing the exercise of this authority are the same as when the authority is exercised in the interest of the whole adventure (i).

SUB-SECT. 6.—Sale of the Cargo.

Effect of wrongful sale.

340. Since it is primarily the master's duty to convey the cargo to its destination, he has no general authority to sell it in the course of the voyage (k). If, therefore, he sells it without lawful excuse, he is guilty of a breach of duty, by which the further performance of the contract of carriage is rendered impossible, and in respect of which the cargo owner acquires a right of action both against the master himself (l) and against his principal, the shipowner (m). In this case the cargo owner is entitled to recover as damages not merely the proceeds of the sale, but the value of the cargo, calculated on the basis of what it would have been worth to him if it had not been sold (n). No allowance is to be made for pro ratâ freight, inasmuch as by the sale of the goods the contract of carriage has been finally broken by the shipowner (o); and the amount of any advance freight paid may be taken into account in estimating the damages (p).

SECT. 4. The Voyage.

Position of buyer.

Moreover, the sale, as being made by a person who had no authority from the owner of the cargo to sell, is not binding upon him (q). He may therefore claim the return of the cargo or its value from the buyer (r), unless by the law of the country in which the sale took place the buyer has in the circumstances acquired a good title against the true owner (s). Thus, a sale of the cargo in market overt would in England clearly be valid, notwithstanding the absence of any authority to sell (t); and a sale abroad, which by the law of the country in which it took place, is a wrongful disposition of the cargo so far as the master is concerned, may, nevertheless, so far as the buyer is concerned, be recognised by the law of the same country as conferring a good title upon him (a).

Master's authority to sell.

341. The authority of the master to dispose of the cargo by way of sale arises out of the necessity of the situation in which he is placed (b), and its exercise is governed by the same principles as govern the exercise of his authority to tranship (c) or to hypothecate the cargo (d). A sale is therefore justifiable in the following cases, namely:—(1) Where funds are required for the purpose of enabling the voyage to be completed, and cannot be raised in any other way (e); and (2) where the cargo, owing to its nature or condition, cannot safely be carried to its destination (f).

342. The master has no authority, for the purpose of enabling the voyage to be completed, to sell the whole of the cargo, since such a sale is inconsistent with the due conveyance of the cargo to its destination (g), and cannot possibly be of benefit to its owner, who is wholly deprived thereof (h). Where, however, the circumstances would justify the hypothecation of the whole of the cargo (i), as where the ship was unable to continue her voyage without repairs (k), the master may sell a part of the cargo for the purpose of raising the funds necessary to enable him to convey the residue to its destination (l), the sale of the part and the hypothecation of the whole being considered as equivalent (m). As in the case of hypothecation (n), the necessity of the case must justify the actual method of raising funds adopted, and it must be shown that it was impossible for the master to raise funds in any other way (o).

For completion of voyage.

343. Except in so far as the sale is to be regarded as a general average sacrifice (p), the ultimate loss occasioned by the sale must fall upon the shipowner (q). The owner of the goods sold has two alternative remedies open to him (r). In the first place, he may treat the proceeds of the sale as a forced loan to the shipowner and claim the amount of the price for which the goods were sold (s). In this case no allowance is to be made for freight pro ratâ (t); though he is entitled to demand immediate repayment, even before the ship arrives at her destination, his receipt of the proceeds is not equivalent to a receipt of the goods themselves at an intermediate port, and therefore no agreement to pay freight pro ratâ can be implied (a). Neither can the full freight be claimed, since the master has put it out of his power to earn it (b). In the second place, the owner of the goods sold has the option of claiming an indemnity from the shipowner against the consequences of the sale (c), the indemnity being on the basis that the goods would have fetched more at their port of destination than they actully did when sold (d). In this case an allowance must be made for the freight that would have been earned by carrying the goods to their destination, since, if they had arrived, the freight would have become payable, and would therefore have been taken into account in estimating their value (e). It is clear that this option will not be exercised if the price for which the goods were sold exceeds their value at their destination, since it is more profitable for their owner to claim the proceeds of the sale (f). Where the ship is lost after the sale, but before the completion of the voyage, the owner of the goods is deprived of his right to claim an indemnity (g), since the goods, even if they had not been sold, would equally have been lost to him, and the basis upon which his indemnity is to be calculated is consequently gone (h).

For preservation of cargo.

344. Where the master sells the cargo on the ground that it cannot safely be carried to its destination, he acts as agent of necessity for the cargo owner (i), and, since his authority is derived from the necessity of the case, a sale which is not justified by necessity is unauthorised and does not bind the cargo owner (k). To justify a sale (l) the following conditions must be fulfilled, namely:—

Necessity for sale.

(1) There must be a necessity for the sale (m). A sale is the last thing that the master should think of (n), since it is his first duty to carry the cargo to its destination, and is only justified by necessity (o). In determining whether a sale is necessary or not, the circumstances of each particular case must be taken into consideration (p). The principal circumstances to be considered are the situation of the cargo (q), and its nature and condition (r). The cargo may be perishable by nature, as in the case of fish or fruit, or it may become perishable through being damaged by sea-water, as in the case of a cargo of hides (a), or grain (b), or wool (c). On the other hand the cargo may not be perishable, as where it is composed of timber (d), or iron or other metal (e), or, though damaged by sea-water, it may be in no danger of perishing and may remain capable of being carried to its destination (f). The wreck of the ship is not necessarily followed by an impossibility of sending forward the cargo, and does not of itself make the sale a measure of necessity or expediency (g); nor is the sale necessarily justified by the loss of the season (h), nor even by the interdiction of commerce or the outbreak of war (i). The master may, by reason of the happening of any of these events, be discharged from his obligation to deliver the cargo at its destination; but it does not therefore follow that he is authorised to sell it (k). To justify him in selling the cargo it must be shown that the master has used all reasonable efforts to have the cargo conveyed to its destination, and that he could not, by any means available to him, carry it, or procure it to be carried, to its destination in a merchantable condition (l), or that he could not do so without incurring an expenditure clearly exceeding its value at its destination (m). It is not, however, essential to prove that the sale was a necessity in the sense that there was no other possible method of dealing with the cargo; a sale may have been obviously necessary, although another course might have been taken (n). It is sufficient if the facts of the particular case show a commercial necessity for the sale; if the cost of dealing with the cargo and sending it on is prohibitive, the interests of the cargo owner are better served by an immediate sale than by incurring wasteful expenditure on his behalf (o). The sale is then justified as being the course which, in the judgment of a wise and prudent man, is apparently the most conducive to the benefit of the cargo owner (p). On the other hand, it is not a sufficient justification for the sale that the master acted as he did in the honest belief that a sale was necessary (q); or that, in the circumstances, the sale of the cargo was a prudent measure (r); or even that the sale turned out, in fact, to be beneficial to the cargo owner (s).

Sale of whole cargo.

Since the justification of the sale is the impossibility of forwarding the cargo to its destination, the authority of the master to sell is not limited to a part of the cargo, as where a sale is necessary for the purpose of raising funds (t), but extends, in a proper case, to the whole (a). In considering the propriety of a sale of the whole cargo, especially where it belongs to different owners, its composition, as well as its state and situation, must be taken into account (b), since it does not follow as a matter of course that because the sale of a part is necessary, the sale of the whole is equally justifiable (c). Thus, where the cargo is partly composed of goods which are not perishable, and which are practically uninjured and therefore capable of being sent on in a merchantable state, a sale of the whole is not justifiable (d). Even where the ship is a wreck and the cargo is still on board, the sale of the cargo in one mass, or of the ship and cargo as an entirety, cannot be justified as against the owners of the goods which are not perishable, because what is sold is the chance of recovering the cargo; and, since the chances of recovering the perishable and the non-perishable portions are different, they should not be sold in one mass (e). Where, on the other hand, the cargo is composed of the same class of goods, and where the whole of it is more or less damaged whilst the specific packages are so intermixed as to render it difficult within the time at the master's disposal and the resources of the port to deal with them separately, the cargo may be regarded as a whole, and a sale of the whole is therefore justifiable (f).

Inability to communicate.

(2) The master must be unable to communicate with the owner of the cargo so as to obtain his instructions (g). The sale must be justified by necessity; hence, it must be shown not merely that it was necessary to sell the cargo (h), but also that it was necessary to sell it at once, without waiting for instructions (i). Whether the cargo is of a perishable nature or not, the master cannot, if it is possible to communicate with the owner before it actually perishes, sell the cargo without communicating with him and obtaining his directions (k). The possibility of communicating with the owner depends upon the circumstances of each case, and involves the consideration of the facts which create the urgency for an early sale (l), the distance of the place where the cargo lies from its owner, the means of communication which may exist (m), and the general position of the master in the particular emergency (n). Such a communication need only be made when an answer can be obtained, or there is a reasonable expectation that it can be obtained, before the sale (o). After communicating the master must wait a reasonable time for an answer (p); if no answer is then received, or if the owner refuses to give him any instructions, he has discharged his duty and may sell the cargo (q). If, however, the owner sends him definite instructions, he must obey them; he is not justified in selling the cargo in defiance of his instructions, even though, in the circumstances, a sale would be the most beneficial course to adopt in the interests of the cargo owner (r).

Master's duty to sell.

345. Where the circumstances of the case justify a sale, the master is not only empowered to sell the cargo as agent of necessity; it is also his duty to sell, if possible (s), since he must protect the cargo owner's interests by every means in his power (t). If, therefore, he fails to sell the cargo in a proper case, he is guilty of a breach of duty, for which the shipowner is responsible (a).

Freight payable after sale.

346. Where the cargo is sold by the master at an intermediate port, as agent of necessity for the shipowner, payment of the full freight cannot be claimed as due, since the condition upon which it becomes due has never been performed (b), and freight is not payable pro ratâ itineris (c), unless there is a special contract to that effect, or unless it is shown that the cargo owner had the option of having his cargo sent on or of taking delivery at the place where it lay (d).

SECT. 5.—The Unloading.

SUB-SECT. 1.—The Arrival of the Ship.

When consignee's obligation arises.

347. The shipowner is not entitled to call upon the consignee to take delivery of the cargo until he himself is in a position to deliver it (e). For this purpose it is necessary that the ship should have arrived at her destination within the meaning of the contract (f), and that she should be ready to discharge her cargo (g). It is therefore important, for the purpose of ascertaining when the consignee's obligation to take delivery arises, to consider what constitutes arrival at the port of discharge.

Arrival of ship.

348. The general principles to be applied are the same whether the arrival under consideration is arrival at the port of loading or arrival at the port of discharge (h). The position of the shipowner is, however, complicated in the latter case by the presence of the cargo on board his ship (i). It is no longer possible for him merely to refuse to allow her to proceed to an unsuitable port, or to treat the contract as at an end, where the circumstances render its performance impossible (k), since the cargo must be discharged and disposed of in some way or other (l). It will therefore be expedient to consider in detail the application of the general principles to arrival at the port of discharge.

Port as ordered.

349. In many cases, the port of discharge is not named in the contract, but it is provided that the ship is to proceed to a port as ordered by the charterer (m). The area within which such port must be situated is usually specified, and, in addition, the charterer's freedom of choice is often restricted by the requirement that the port is to be a safe port (n), or that it is to be not only a safe port, but also one in which the ship can always lie and discharge afloat (o). The failure of the charterer to give any orders as provided in the charterparty, so that no port is named at all, does not necessarily impose any duty on the master to communicate with the charterer and to ask for his instructions (p). If there is no such duty and the master acts as a prudent and honest man, he may take the course which he reasonably believes to be best for the advantage of the charterer; and he may therefore proceed to any port within the specified area, and call upon the consignee to take delivery there (q). Where the charterer names the place of discharge, he must name a port (r) which fulfils the requirements of the contract (s); and if he names a port which is unsafe, or which is otherwise not a proper port, the shipowner may refuse to allow his ship to proceed to it, and may discharge the cargo at a port which reasonably falls within the terms of the contract (t). In accordance with the same principle, if the port named as a safe port, though safe at the time when the name is received, subsequently becomes unsafe, the shipowner may call upon the charterer to name another port, otherwise he may deliver the cargo at any safe port which may reasonably be substituted for the purpose (a).

Safe port

SECT. 5. The Unloading.

It is, therefore, necessary to consider the physical features of the port named (d), and to take into account the size and draught of the ship (e). If she cannot enter the port without discharging a portion of her cargo, the shipowner is not bound to lighten her outside (f) for the purpose of enabling her to enter (g). Any physical obstruction must, however, in order that it may have this effect, be of a permanent character; the existence of a temporary impediment, such as, for instance, a bar, which the ship cannot cross owing to the tides being neap (h) or the water in the river being low (i), or the presence of ice obstructing entrance to the port (k), does not render the port unsafe, and the ship cannot, therefore, refuse to proceed (l). The port is not unsafe because the ship must necessarily take the ground at certain states of the tide (m), though if the contract provides that the ship is to lie always afloat the shipowner may refuse to proceed to such a port (n). It is not, however, sufficient that the port named should be a safe port in the sense that there is no physical danger to the ship (o). There must be no danger of capture or seizure from political reasons (p). The charterer must not, therefore, name a port in which the unloading of the cargo is by law prohibited (q), or which cannot be reached by the ship without running the risk of hostile capture (r).

The same principles apply where the destination to which the ship is ordered is not a port in the wide sense of the word, but a dock (s).

Consequences of naming unsafe port.

351. The charterer who names an unsafe port must indemnify the shipowner against the consequences (t). He must, therefore, pay any demurrage (a) or damages for detention (b) which may become payable by reason of delay caused thereby, and, if the ship has had to be shifted to another port, any extra port charges incurred (c). He is not, however, liable for any damage which the ship may sustain during the shifting (d), nor for the costs of an action improperly brought against the shipowner by the consignee for his failure to deliver the cargo at the named port (e).

Shipowner's duty to reach port of discharge.

352. It is the duty of the shipowner to reach the port of discharge, whether specified in the contract or named afterwards, and to deliver his cargo there, unless he has some lawful excuse (f). If he is unable to complete the voyage, his inability to do so may be excused by the terms of his contract (g); but, as he has not fulfilled the condition upon which freight becomes payable (h), he is not entitled, as a general rule, to claim payment even of pro ratâ freight, though he has in fact delivered the cargo to the consignee (i). If, on the other hand, the cause which prevents him from reaching the port of discharge and delivering the cargo there is not excepted by the contract, he not only loses his right to freight, but, if he lands the cargo, also becomes liable to the consignee for his failure to deliver it at its destination (k).

So near thereto as she can safely get.

353. In practice the contract usually provides that the ship is to proceed to the port of discharge or so near thereto as she can safely get (l). This provision is intended to benefit the shipowner, and its effect is to substitute an alternative destination to which the ship may proceed (m). By proceeding to this alternative destination and delivering the cargo there, the shipowner equally completes the voyage in accordance with the terms of the contract, and thus entitles himself to be paid the full freight (n).

The right to proceed to this alternative destination does not arise unless it is unsafe or impossible for the ship to proceed to her original destination (o). The safety of the ship herself must be involved (p); it is not sufficient to show that, if she were to proceed to her original destination, the cargo would be exposed to danger (q). If the cargo alone is exposed to danger, the shipowner may be excused from proceeding further (r); but the delivery of the cargo at an intermediate port is not a delivery at its destination, and therefore no freight will be payable (s). At the same time, since the object of the contract is the delivery of the cargo, the standard of safety is the safety of the ship as a laden ship (t). She is, therefore, not bound to proceed to her original destination if the presence of the cargo renders it unsafe for her to do so (a), even where in the absence of the cargo there would be no difficulty or danger (b). Thus, if the ship cannot reach her port of discharge without lightening (c), the master may call upon the consignee to take delivery of the cargo before reaching the port, since he is not bound to lighten the ship (d); and the same principle applies where the port of discharge is rendered unsafe by reason of a blockade (e) or embargo (f). On the other hand, the master must not stop too soon (g); he must proceed as near as he can safely get in the direction of the port of discharge (h). He is not entitled to call upon the consignee to accept delivery under the contract until he is unable to go any further without endangering the ship (i); and the place of delivery is the place where the ship is stopped through

This view is, however, inconsistent with The Alhambra, supra (which was followed in Reynolds & Co. v. Tomlinson, supra, and Erasmo Treglia v. Smith's Timber Co., Ltd. (1896), 1 Com. her inability to proceed (k). The delivery of the cargo at any other place cannot be regarded as a delivery at the alternative destination provided in the contract; and, however reasonably the master may have acted, he must be taken to have abandoned the voyage by delivering the cargo short of its destination (l). Even a delivery at the nearest safe port is not sufficient to entitle the master to his freight (m), unless the ship cannot in fact proceed any further with safety (n). The contract may, however, by its terms provide that, if it becomes unsafe for the ship to proceed, through the happening of some specified event (o), to her port of discharge, the master is to have the option of landing the goods at some other safe port (p). In this case it must be shown that the port of discharge has in fact become unsafe; it is not sufficient that the master exercised his option in the honest belief that he was justified in doing so (q).

What amounts to obstruction.

354. It is the duty of the master to proceed on the original voyage until he is prevented from proceeding any further by some permanent obstruction (r), which may be either physical (s) or political (t). A permanent obstruction does not necessarily mean an obstruction that will remain for ever: there must, in every case, be some limit of time within which an obstruction ceasing to exist cannot be regarded as permanent (a), and beyond which a continuing obstacle ceases to be temporary (b). No impediment arising in the ordinary course of navigation (c), or arising in the usual and ordinary course of management of a particular port (d), and not lasting beyond what is, in the circumstances of the case, a reasonable time, is to be regarded as a permanent obstruction; and in these cases the ship must wait until the obstruction has ceased to exist (e), and must proceed to the port of discharge before the consignee can be required to take delivery of the cargo (f). Thus, the ship may be unable to proceed beyond a particular place because, at the time when she arrives there, there is not sufficient water to allow her to proceed further (g). Nevertheless if, by waiting until the tide serves, she is able to proceed, she must wait, and cannot deliver her cargo there (h). The contract may, however, by its terms provide that the ship is not bound to wait until the tide serves (i).

What amounts to arrival.

355. Even when the ship has actually reached the port of discharge, she has not necessarily reached the destination contemplated by the contract (k). In the absence of any stipulation (l) or custom (m) to the contrary, she has reached her destination when she has arrived at that place in the port at which ships about to discharge such a cargo as that which she carries usually lie (n), and she need not be in the particular part of the port in which the particular cargo is to be discharged (o). The same principle applies where the contract requires the ship to reach a particular dock (p); she cannot be considered as having arrived at her destination until she is inside the dock (q), in the usual place of discharge (r), though she need not have reached her actual discharging berth (s).

356. The contract, however, in naming the destination of the ship, may describe a more limited area, such as a quay or quay berth, or a particular part of a port or dock, and in this case the ship must actually be at the place named before she can be said to have reached her destination (t). If, therefore, without any default on the part of the consignee (a), the ship is unable to reach her berth at once, as, for instance, where the berth is already occupied (b), or where the tides are too low to permit her to proceed for the present (c), the risk of delay falls upon the shipowner and not upon the consignee (d), and if by the custom of the port it is usual to lighten ships after their arrival in the port to enable them to reach their destination, the shipowner must lighten his ship if necessary (e). The same principle applies where the destination of the ship is not a berth specified in the contract, but a berth to be named by the charterer (f). Provided that he acts reasonably, he may name any berth which complies with the requirements of the contract (g). Unless, therefore, the contract expressly requires him to name a vacant berth (h), the berth named, if otherwise in order, need not be vacant at the time when the ship arrives in the port, and the shipowner is bound, if necessary, to wait for a reasonable time until the berth is free (i). In this case also the ship has not reached her destination until she has actually reached her berth, the risk of delay in the meanwhile falling upon the shipowner (k). Where, however, the obstruction which causes the delay is of a permanent and not merely of a temporary nature (l), as, for instance, where the berth will not be available until after the lapse of a time which, having regard to the objects of the adventure of both charterer and shipowner, is, as a matter of business, wholly unreasonable (m), the shipowner is only bound to proceed as near to the berth, whether specified in the contract (n) or named afterwards (o), as he can safely get (p). When by doing this he has reached a destination which must be deemed as between the parties to be that provided by his contract (q), he is entitled to require the consignee to take delivery of the cargo from the ship as she lies (r).

Proceeding to discharging berth.

357. Where the destination of the ship, as defined by contract or by custom, is not identical with the place of discharge, the consignee is entitled to select the actual place at which the cargo is to be discharged (s), provided that the place selected is a usual place for the purpose (t) and is also a safe place for the ship (a); and the master may be restrained by injunction from discharging elsewhere (b). The master cannot refuse to go to the place selected merely upon the ground that it will be more expensive for the shipowner to discharge the cargo there than would otherwise be the case (c). If he has already gone to another berth, he must shift the ship to the place selected by the consignee, and he is not entitled to make it a condition of his doing so that the consignee shall pay any expenses already incurred (d). Moreover, if the usual mode of delivering the particular kind of cargo is to unload a portion of the cargo in one part of the port, and then, when the ship is lightened, to go to another part of the port and there finish the unloading, the shipowner is bound to deliver the cargo in that way (e). In such a case the risk of delay in reaching the actual place or places of delivery falls upon the consignee and not upon the shipowner, since the ship has ex hypothesi already reached her destination, and time has therefore begun to run against the consignee (f).

Readiness to discharge.

358. To be ready to discharge, the ship must not only have reached her destination, she must also have complied with all the legal formalities necessary to enable the discharge to begin (g). The master must therefore have reported the ship and crew, and must have delivered his manifest and other papers to the proper officers (h). This rule does not, however, apply where the port authorities have already given the ship permission to begin the discharge of her cargo, and the consignee must then be prepared to take delivery at once (i).

In accordance with the same principle, the mere physical presence of the ship at the place named or indicated in the contract as her destination is not an arrival at her destination so as to bind the consignee to take delivery of the cargo, unless she has a legal right to remain there for the purpose of being discharged (k).

Consignee's duty to discover arrival.

359. Apart from special contract (l) or custom (m), it is the duty of the consignee to use due and reasonable diligence to discover when the ship arrives with the cargo on board (n); and the master is, therefore, under no obligation in the absence of special contract to give notice of his arrival or readiness to unload, whether the ship is a general ship (o) or whether she is working under a charter-party (p). In either case time begins to run against the consignee as soon as the ship is ready to unload (q), and it is immaterial that he was in fact ignorant of her arrival (r). Where, however, his ignorance is attributable to the fault of the shipowner or his agent, any delay occasioned thereby falls upon the shipowner (s). The SUB-SECT. 2.—The Delivery of the Cargo.

(i.) The Person to whom Delivery should be Made.

Holder of bill of lading.

360. The person who is entitled to claim delivery of the cargo is the holder of the bill of lading, whether as consignee named in it or as assignee of it under a valid indorsement (a). If the shipowner delivers the cargo to a person who is not entitled to it, he is responsible to the true owner for the value of the cargo (b). He is not, however, bound to make delivery unless the bill of lading is produced (c), and any existing liens over the cargo are satisfied (d).

Conflicting claims.

361. If conflicting claims are made (e) to the cargo the shipowner must interplead (f), unless he is prepared to take upon himself the risk of deciding who is the true owner (g). He is, however, justified in delivering the cargo to the person who produces a bill of lading, and who appears to be the consignee named in it or the assignee of it, provided that he has no notice or knowledge of any defect in such person's title; and it is immaterial that the

to address the ship, as provided by the charterparty, to the charterer's agents, who would have notified the consignees). But the contract may relieve the shipowner from the consequences of failing to give notice (E. Clemens Horst Co. v. Norfolk and North American Steam Shipping Co. (1906), 11 Com. Cas. 141).

R. 10 Exch. 274. As to the holder of the bill of lading, see pp. 157 et seq., ante. A shipper who has paid freight in advance may sue the shipowner if the goods are not delivered in accordance with the bill of lading (Joseph v. Knox (1813), 3 Camp. 320).

(b) Erichsen v. Barkworth (1858), 3 H. & N. 894, Ex. Ch., per CROMPTON, J.; London Joint Stock Bank v. British Amsterdam Maritime Agency (1910), 16 Com. Cas. 102; compare Anderson v. Clark (1824), 2 Bing. 20.

In this case the consignee is not justified in taking possession of the goods by force (Lucas v. Nockells (1828), 4 Bing. 729, Ex. Ch., per BEST, C.J., at p. 741). As to delivery to a holder of the mate's receipt, see p. 153, ante.

(d) Erichsen v. Barkworth, supra. As to liens, see pp. 617 et seq., post.

(e) It is not necessary that an actual claim should be made; it is probably sufficient if the master is aware of circumstances giving rise to a claim (Glyn Mills & Co. v. East and West India Dock Co., supra, per Lord BLACKBURN, at p. 610.)

bill of lading produced purports to be one of a set (h). In this case the delivery under the bill of lading produced relieves the master from further responsibility (i); it does not, however, otherwise affect the rights of any other persons who may have a better title to the cargo than the person who took delivery (k). On the other hand, a delivery to the person named as consignee in the bill of lading, without requiring production of the bill of lading, cannot be justified if such consignee is not in fact entitled to claim delivery (l).

Where shipowner discharged.

362. The shipowner remains liable under his contract until he has made delivery to a person entitled (m). A delivery to a wharfinger or to a dock authority is not, in itself, sufficient (n), unless the contract provides for such delivery (o), or unless there is a custom to that effect (p). If, however, no person comes forward to claim the goods, such a delivery may exempt the shipowner from further liability in respect of the goods actually delivered (q).

(ii.) The Method of Discharging the Cargo,

Discharge a joint act.

363. The discharge of the cargo from the ship is the joint act of the shipowner and the consignee (r). The shipowner's duty is to get the cargo out of the holds (s) and to deliver it to the consignee (t), whilst it is the duty of the consignee to take delivery of

Where, however, the goods are discharged and received into lighters alongside, the master may be bound by custom to take care of the lighters until they are fully laden (Catley v. Winteringham (1792), Peake, 202 [150]; see title CUSTOM AND USAGES, Vol. X., p. 291), but not afterwards (Robinson v. Turpin (1805), Peake (3rd ed.), 203, n.).

it (a). The extent of their respective obligations in any particular case is, in the absence of any special contract (b), regulated by the custom, if any, of the port of discharge (c).

Duties apart from stipulation.

364. For the purpose of performing his part of the discharge the shipowner must provide suitable tackle and a sufficient number of men (d). As a general rule the ship's tackle is used (e) and the work is done by the crew of the ship (f). The shipowner is not bound to employ any additional men, unless the contract fixes the time within which the cargo is to be discharged and the crew cannot complete the discharge in time (g). The delivery takes place from the ship's tackle over the side of the ship (h); and the shipowner has performed his obligation when he has put the goods in such a position that the consignee can take delivery of them (i). The consignee's part in the joint operation begins when the goods are brought to the rail of the ship and placed within his reach;

The shipowner must therefore bear any expense necessary for the proper discharge of the cargo, such as, for instance, the expense of repairing torn bags to prevent leakage of contents (Leach & Co. v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Co. (1910), 16 Com. Cas. 143).

The contract may provide that the whole of the discharge is to be at the consignee's risk (Smackman v. General Steam Navigation Co. (1908), 13 Com. SECT. 5. The Unloading.

and he, in his turn, must provide the proper appliances and labour for the purpose of performing it (k). If, therefore, the ship is discharging her cargo afloat, he must provide the necessary lighters and lightermen (l); if she is discharging at a quay, he must employ a sufficient number of labourers (m); and any stowing or stacking that may be required must be done by him, and not by the shipowner (n).

Special stipulations etc.

365. The position of the parties may be materially modified by the terms of their contract (o), or by the custom of the port of discharge (p). Thus, by contract or custom goods may be delivered to the consignee on the deck of the ship in board (q); he may be required to do the whole of the unloading, including the discharge of the holds (r); or, when the cargo is in bulk, such as, for instance, a grain cargo, he may be required to supply sacks and to provide the necessary labour for filling them, the shipowner's ordinary duty of delivering over the ship's side being resumed after the sacks are filled (s). On the other hand, the shipowner's duty may not cease at the ship's side; he may be required to place the goods in the lighter alongside the ship (t) or to deliver them on to the quay (a) without any assistance from the consignee. Where the goods have to be delivered on to the quay, the shipowner must provide, at his own expense, any lighters that may be necessary (b); he may also be bound to stack the goods, and is not necessarily discharged by delivering them on to the nearest available part of the quay (c).

SECT. 5. The Unloading.

"Consignee's risk and expense."

366. It is frequently an express term of the contract that the consignee shall take his goods from alongside the ship at his own risk and expense (d). This term merely puts into words what would otherwise be implied, namely, that the goods are to be delivered from the ship's tackle at the side of the ship (e); but its effect is to exclude any custom of the port which is inconsistent with delivery at the side of the ship (f), since the parties have defined their intention in the contract (g). Any such inconsistent custom is equally excluded by such an express term, although the contract further provides that the cargo is to be discharged in accordance with the custom of the port (h). If, therefore, the ship is to be unloaded afloat, a custom requiring the shipowner to pay for lightering the goods to the shore must be rejected (i); and if through lack of water the ship is unable to come right alongside the quay, the shipowner cannot be required, in accordance with the custom of the port in such cases, to provide labourers to carry the goods ashore and deliver them on the quay (k). Similarly, he is not bound by a custom which imposes upon shipowners other duties in addition to the delivery; thus, in the case of a timber cargo, where by the custom delivery does not take place when the logs are placed in the water alongside, but after they have been chained together into rafts and officially measured, an express term as to delivery alongside excludes the custom, and the consignee must therefore bear the expense of rafting (l). A custom, however, which merely regulates the manner of delivery, and which does not impose upon the shipowner any fresh obligation, but defines the extent of his share in the joint operation of discharging the cargo, binds the shipowner, if it is not

(b) Scrutton v. Childs (1877), 36 L. T. 212. If the goods have to be removed from the quay in lighters, the shipowner may be bound to put them into the lighters (Marzetti v. Smith & Son (1883), 49 L. T. 580, C. A.). inconsistent with delivery alongside (m). Thus, if the goods have to be delivered into lighters, the shipowner may be bound, by the custom, to place them in the lighters and not merely to put them within reach of the consignee's men (n); if the goods have to be delivered on to a quay, he may be bound to place them on the quay and to stack them there (o). A custom of this kind does not, however, bind the shipowner where the contract by its terms expressly excludes the customs of the port (p).

Alternative methods of delivery.

367. Where alternative methods of delivery are available, such as, for instance, where the goods may either be landed upon a wharf or be delivered into lighters alongside without first landing them on the wharf, the consignee is, apart from custom (q), entitled to select whichever method he pleases (r), and the shipowner cannot decline to comply with his wishes on the ground that another method of delivery would be less expensive (s) or more convenient (t) to himself. If, therefore, the consignee asks for his goods to be delivered into lighters, they must be so delivered (a). The shipowner is not entitled to require, as a condition of delivering the goods into lighters, that the consignee shall contribute towards the wharfage dues payable by the ship (b); and if they are actually landed on the wharf against the wish of the consignee the shipowner must indemnify the consignee against any wharfage dues to which the goods may have become liable in consequence of being so landed (c).

Effect of custom.

There may, however, be a custom of the port of discharge by which goods are not directly discharged into lighters, but are first landed on the wharf and thence removed into the lighters (d). In this case the custom may require the wharfage dues payable in respect of the goods to be paid by the shipowner (e); if, however, the custom requires the consignee to pay them, he cannot claim to be indemnified against them by the shipowner, and it is immaterial

(e) Petrocochino v. Bott, supra. In this case the shipowner may, by the terms of his contract, require the consignee to pay them; see, for instance, the clause known as "the London clause," which was held in Produce Brokers Co. v. Furness, Withy & Co. (1912), 17 Com. Cas. 165, not to apply when the ship discharged at a riverside wharf and not in dock.

SECT. 5. The Unloading.

that he had insisted upon his goods being discharged direct into lighters (f).

Sorting different consignments.

368. Where the cargo is composed of goods consigned to different consignees, it is the duty of the shipowner to deliver to each his proper goods (g). Thus, where goods of the same description are shipped under different bills of lading, the shipowner must appropriate the correct quantity to be delivered under each bill of lading (h); and if the various consignments are distinguished by different marks, he must sort them accordingly (i). Where the marks become obliterated during the voyage, so that it is no longer possible to identify the several consignments, either wholly or in part, the shipowner must deliver to each consignee such portion of the goods as may remain identifiable and therefore specifically deliverable; but he is not entitled, as of right, to apportion the mass which cannot be identified between the different consignees (j); and in so far as he is not in a position to deliver to each his proper goods, he is guilty of a breach of contract, for which he is liable in damages unless excused by the terms of his contract (k). The consignees may, however, elect to accept delivery, though the goods are incapable of identification; in this case they become tenants in common of the unidentified goods, the share of each being in the proportion that the quantity shipped by his consignor bears to the whole quantity shipped, and the shipowner is relieved pro tanto from his liability (l). Where, however, the goods are shipped in bulk, and not in separate parcels, different bills of lading being given for undivided portions of the bulk, the shipowner is not bound, if the cargo arrives in a damaged condition, to apportion the damaged goods between the different bills of lading, so as to deliver to each consignee the correct amount of sound and damaged goods falling to his share (m).

(i) Compare Elder, Dempster & Co. v. Dunn & Co. (1909), 101 L. T. 578, H. L. But a delivery of goods wrongly marked is a good delivery, where their identity is clear (Parsons v. New Zealand Shipping Co., [1901] 1 K. B. 548, C. A. In Sandeman & Sons v. Tyzack and Branfoot Steamship Co., Ltd., the whole of the goods shipped did not arrive, and it was impossible to say whether the goods of any particular consignee were amongst the unidentifiable portion which arrived or amongst those which were lost. Different considerations may perhaps apply when the whole of the goods shipped arrive, since they all clearly belong to one or other of the consignees, though identification is impossible (see ibid., per Lord LOREBURN, at p. 689, and per Lord SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE, at p. 691). No definite opinion was, however, expressed, except by Lord MOULTON (ibid., at pp. 696, 697), who held that the shipowner does not perform his duty unless he delivers the specific goods to which each consignee is entitled.

(k) Sandeman & Sons v. Tyzack and Branfoot Steamship Co., Ltd., supra (where it was held that a condition exempting the shipowner from responsibility for obliteration of marks did not apply, as the whole of the goods shipped had not arrived).

Where goods of different kinds are shipped in one parcel under a general description and one bill of lading is given for them all, the shipowner is not bound, in the absence of any custom to that effect at the port of discharge, to sort the various items making up the parcel, but may deliver them in a mass as they come to hand (n).

(iii.) The Time within which the Delivery must Take Place.

Duties of consignee.

369. The consignee is not entitled to keep the ship waiting for an indefinite period until he chooses to come forward and claim his cargo; he must take delivery within the period fixed by the terms of his contract (o), or ascertainable by reference to those terms and the surrounding circumstances (p). If the consignee fails or refuses to take delivery within that period, the shipowner is entitled to land and warehouse the cargo, or to deal with it otherwise, as may seem most expedient (q); and if, owing to the rate at which the consignee takes delivery, the ship is detained for a further period, the shipowner acquires the right to claim demurrage or damages for detention, as the case may be (r). The shipowner, however, must himself be in a position to perform his own part of the obligation, otherwise his rights against the consignee do not arise until he is in a position to do so (s).

When time fixed.

370. Where the contract fixes the time within which the discharge of the cargo is to take place (t), the consignee's obligation to accept delivery within that time is absolute and unconditional (a).

(m) Grange & Co. v. Taylor (1904), 9 Com. Cas. 223, where a provision in the various bills of lading that each bill of lading was to bear its proportion of shortage and damage was held only to regulate the rights of the bill of lading holders inter se.

SECT. 5. The Unloading.

If, therefore, the unloading of the ship is delayed, he has failed to perform this obligation, and, except where he has some lawful excuse, is liable to pay demurrage or damages for detention in respect of the period during which the ship is thereby delayed (b).

Excuses :

371. The consignee is excused for his failure to discharge the ship within the time fixed by the contract in the following cases only, namely :—

(1) ship-owner's default.

(1) Where the delay is attributable to the negligence or default of the shipowner or of persons for whom he is responsible (c). Thus, the shipowner has no claim against the consignee where the former wrongfully refuses to deliver the cargo (d), or where the delay is occasioned by his failure to provide a sufficient number of men (e), and his consequent inability to perform his part of the unloading within the required time (f), or by some other cause for which he is responsible (g). There must, however, be some default on the part of the shipowner (h); if the cause of the delay is beyond the shipowner's control, the consignee is responsible, even though the delay is, in fact, attributable to the shipowner's inability to perform his part of the contract (i). The consignee's engagement is absolute, whereas the shipowner's engagement is merely that he will not by his default prevent the consignee from performing his own part of the contract (k). It is therefore immaterial whether the shipowner's inability is due to some physical misfortune, such as, for instance, bad weather interrupting the discharge (l), or to the act of third persons over whom he has no control, such as, for instance, a strike of dock labourers (m). In accordance with the same principle there is no default on the part of a shipowner who lawfully withholds delivery in the rightful exercise of his lien (n);

(h) The consignee cannot rely upon any default of the shipowner, if he himself procured it (Furnell v. Thomas (1828), 5 Bing. 188). Delay caused through the necessity of taking in ballast during the discharge to stiffen the ship is not attributable to the shipowner as a default (Houlder v. Weir, [1905] 2 K. B. 267).

(2) excepted cause.

(2) Where the cause of the delay is covered by an exception in the contract (p). The effect of an exception is merely to suspend the consignee's obligation whilst the excepted cause is in operation (q); it does not protect him against the consequences of his own default (r). Thus, where the contract contains a strike clause (s), and a strike breaks out during the unloading, the consignee is excused in so far as the unloading is in fact delayed by the strike, but no further (t).

Consignee's duty otherwise absolute.

labourers to discharge the ship (e), or from obtaining railway wagons into which to discharge the cargo (f); or that it was impossible to unload the cargo in time on account of bad weather (g); or that the landing of the cargo was prohibited by the orders, lawful (h) or unlawful (i), of the port authorities; or that, owing to the manner in which the cargo was stowed, he could not gain access to his goods until other goods stowed above them were removed, and that the delay which under the conditions incorporated in the bill of lading was attributable to him was in fact caused by the failure of the owners of such goods to remove them in time (k); nor can the absolute nature of the consignee's engagement be modified in any way by a custom of the port of discharge which is not consistent with the terms in which the obligation is expressed (l).

Where no time fixed.

373. Where the contract does not fix any particular time within which the discharge is to take place (m), the obligation of the consignee is to take delivery of his cargo within a reasonable time (n). In considering the question what is a reasonable time all the circumstances of the particular case, from the arrival of the ship to the completion of the unloading, must be taken into account (o); it is not sufficient to ascertain what would be a reasonable time in ordinary circumstances (p), since there is no such thing as a reasonable time in the abstract, and the answer to the question must necessarily depend upon circumstances (q). The extent of the consignee's obligation is, therefore, to be measured not by reference only to the usual time according to the practice of the port (r), but by reference to the time which is in fact reasonable in the circumstances which actually exist (s), and the consignee fulfils his obligation, however protracted the delay may be, so long as such delay is attributable to causes beyond his control and he has acted neither negligently nor unreasonably (t). On the other hand, he is not entitled to detain the ship even for the usual time if by reasonable diligence on his part the cargo might have been taken away sooner (u). Thus, where he is bound to discharge at a definite rate per day and has been able to accelerate the rate of discharge beyond that rate, he cannot rely on the fact that he has accomplished the whole discharge with reasonable dispatch at the average rate of discharge if he is responsible for an undue falling off in the rate of discharge towards the end (v).

Reasonable time.

374. For the purpose of ascertaining what is a reasonable time in any particular case the principal factors to be taken into consideration are the following, namely:—(1) The natural conditions of the port (w); (2) the custom of the port (a); (3) the actual state of affairs existing at the port (b); and (4) the conduct of the assignee (c).

Natural conditions of the port.

(1) The natural conditions of the port. The physical nature of the port may necessarily lead to delay (d). Thus, the port may be tidal, and the ship may be compelled through fear of taking the ground at neap tide to leave her berth during the discharge and lie outside until the next spring tides (e); or, again, she may be

(r) Accordingly the dicta in Burmester v. Hodgson (1810), 2 Camp. 488, and Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co. (1878), 4 Ex. D. 165, C. A., are incorrect.

The time during which the discharge is suspended owing to the shipowner's lawful exercise of his lien counts as against the consignee (Lyle Shipping Co. v. Cardiff Corporation, [1900] 2 Q. B. 638, C. A.).

SECT. 5. The Unloading.

discharging in a roadstead and the lighters may be prevented by bad weather from continuing the discharge (f). The causes of delay need not, however, be physical (g). Thus, the custom-house authorities and the persons employed at the port may be habitually dilatory so that the ordinary discharge is very slow (h). The appliances and facilities for discharge and the methods usually employed at the port must also be taken into consideration (i). The means of discharging cargoes at the port may be under the control of one person, who imposes his own terms and conditions upon all ships arriving at the port (j); or the port may be scantily furnished with labour or with facilities for discharge (k).

Custom of the port.

(2) The custom of the port (l). It is not unusual for the contract to provide expressly that the discharge is to be effected according to the custom of the port (m). This provision does not, however, appear to be necessary (n), since any stipulation as to unloading is always construed as made with reference to the custom of the port of discharge (o). Thus, it may be the custom of the port to discharge ships in a certain order (p) or subject to certain regulations (q) or at a certain rate (r), or that work may only be carried on at certain times (s) or in accordance with a particular method (t). The ship may be required to discharge a portion of her cargo in one part of the port and to shift to another place for the purpose of discharging the rest; and it may be the custom of the port not to count the time occupied in shifting (a). The contract may, however, expressly exclude the custom of the port or any particular custom, which cannot then be taken into account (b).

Actual state of affairs.

(3) The actual state of affairs existing at the port. Owing to the port being crowded with shipping awaiting discharge the ship may be compelled to wait for a considerable time until a berth is vacant (c); the available means of discharge, such as lighters (d) or cranes (e), may be insufficient; the railway wagons necessary for the removal of the cargo may not be procurable (f); or the warehouses in which the cargo is by the custom of the port to be deposited may already be filled (g). There may be a shortage of labour in consequence of a strike (h). In addition, the progress of

Such a custom does not bind a shipowner whose ship is, owing to changed circumstances, capable of discharging at a substantially greater rate; Ropner & Co. v. Stoate, Hosegood & Co. (1905), 10 Com. the discharge may be interrupted by the port authorities ordering the ship to leave her discharging berth (i), or by any other external cause beyond the consignee's control (k).

Conduct of the consignee.

(4) The conduct of the consignee. It is the duty of the consignee to use reasonable diligence in receiving the cargo (l). It is, therefore, his duty to do everything that he can reasonably be expected to do in the circumstances (m). If there is a shortage of lighters (n) or railway wagons (o), he must procure them if possible; if he is the port authority, he is not excused for delay occasioned by his acts in that capacity (p); nor is he excused where the delay is attributable to his own previous engagements (q), except in so far as such delay is reasonably incurred in the ordinary course of business within the contemplation of the parties (r). In the same way he is responsible for any delay arising in consequence of his failure to discharge a lien lawfully exercised over his cargo (s). Moreover, though, in general, where the custom of the port is incorporated in the contract he cannot be required to do more than the custom demands (t), the effect of a particular custom may be to render his obligation absolute; he may be required not merely to use his best endeavours to discharge the ship by providing a suitable berth and quay space or other facilities for discharge, but actually to provide them, whatever the existing circumstances of the port may be (a).

SUB-SECT. 3.—The Warehousing of the Cargo.

Power to land and warehouse cargo.

375. If the consignee fails to come forward to take delivery of his cargo, the master may be expressly empowered, by the terms of the contract (b) or by the custom of the port of discharge (c), to land and warehouse the cargo at the consignee's risk and expense. This power need not be exercised as soon as the consignee makes default. The master may, if he thinks fit, keep the cargo on board for a reasonable time before landing it; and, provided that he has acted reasonably, he is not precluded from claiming demurrage by the fact that he might without any breach of duty have landed the cargo sooner (d). Where the contract is silent on the matter and there is no custom applicable to the case, the master is not entitled to land the cargo at once; he must retain it on board for a reasonable period to give the consignee every opportunity of taking delivery (e). Moreover, he has the right to retain the cargo on board as long as may be reasonably necessary for his protection (f). It is his duty, however, to deal with the cargo in a reasonable manner, having regard to his lien for freight (g), and though he may retain the cargo on demurrage, he must not act vexatiously in so doing (h), or detain the ship beyond a reasonable time (i). He, therefore, is allowed to take an alternative course, and he may land and warehouse the cargo upon giving notice to the consignee that the cargo is at his disposal on payment of the freight (k). If, however, it is impossible for him to land the cargo, either because there is no warehouse accommodation or because the landing is prohibited, he may take any other reasonable course that may be open to him, and if the most prudent course is to bring the cargo back to the port of loading he is entitled to do so, and may in that case claim freight in respect of both the outward and the homeward voyage (l).

SECT. 5. The Unloading.

Consignee subsequently coming forward.

376. If the master begins to land the cargo in the absence of the consignee, and the consignee afterwards comes forward before the discharge is completed and demands his cargo, the master must deliver the portion of the cargo remaining undischarged in accordance with the consignee's instructions, and he is not entitled to continue discharging as before (m), unless it would cause expense or loss of time to the shipowner to change the mode of delivery (n).

Effect of landing cargo.

377. Apart from contract or special custom, the shipowner's liability does not at common law (o) cease on the landing of the cargo; though he is no longer liable as a carrier, he incurs a new liability as a warehouseman (p). Moreover, it seems that if he places the cargo not into a warehouse belonging to himself, but into a warehouse belonging to a third person, he does not, apart from statute (q), retain his lien (r), though he may give a lien to the warehouseman (s).

Statutory position.

378. In consequence of the difficulties in which the master is placed, provision has been made by statute for the purpose of enabling him to land his cargo and at the same time to preserve his lien (t). The statutory provisions only apply to cargoes imported from foreign parts into the United Kingdom (a); moreover, they do not affect the exercise of any powers conferred upon the master by the terms of the contract (b) or by custom, whether of the port of discharge (c) or of a particular trade (d).

entry (h) of them, or where he fails, after making entry, to take delivery of them, the shipowner (i) is empowered (k) to land the goods at any time after the expiration of the time for delivery expressed in the contract, or, if no time is expressed in the contract, after the expiration of seventy-two hours, exclusive of a Sunday or holiday, from the time of the report (l) of the ship (m). The goods must, if this can conveniently be done, be placed on the wharf (n) or in the warehouse (o) named in the contract, otherwise the wharf or warehouse where they are placed must be one where similar goods are usually placed, and, if the goods are dutiable, must be duly approved by the Commissioners of Customs for the landing of dutiable goods (p).

Offer to take delivery.

The owner of the goods may at any time before they are landed offer to take delivery of them; in this case he must be allowed to do so, and his entry is to be preferred to any entry (q) which may have been made by the shipowner (r).

Assortment.

If any goods are landed for assortment at the wharf where the ship is discharged, and if their owner at the time of the landing has made entry and is ready to take delivery and to convey them to some other wharf or warehouse, the goods must be assorted at landing, and must, if demanded, be delivered to their owner within twenty-four hours after assortment, the expense of landing and assortment being borne by the shipowner (s).

Act, 1894, had not been passed (ibid., s. 500). But if he takes charge of them, he is subject to the same rights and liabilities as the shipowner (Glyn Mills & Co. v. East and West India Docks Co. (1882), 7 App. Cas. 591, per Lord BLACKBURN, at p. 614). If the goods are seized through a wrong entry being made owing to a misdescription in the bill of lading, the loss falls on the consignee (Shirwell v. Shaplock (1815), 2 Chit. 397). SECT. 5. The Unloading.

When notice of readiness required.

380. If, before landing, the goods have been entered (t) for landing and warehousing at some other wharf or warehouse than that at which the ship is discharging, it is the duty of the shipowner to deliver the goods to their owner upon his offer to take delivery (u), or to give him, at the time of his offer, correct information of the time when the goods can be delivered (w), otherwise he is not entitled to land the goods under his statutory power without first giving their owner twenty-four hours' notice in writing of his readiness to deliver them, and if he lands them without such notice he must do so at his own risk and expense (a).

Lien on goods landed.

381. At the time of landing the goods (b) and placing them in the custody of any wharfinger (c) or warehouseman (d), the shipowner may give the wharfinger or warehouseman notice in writing that the goods are to remain subject to his lien for freight or other charges, the amount of which is to be mentioned in the notice (e); in this case the goods remain subject to the lien, and the wharfinger or warehouseman must not deliver them to their owner until the lien is discharged (f).

Sale.

382. If the lien is not discharged the wharfinger or warehouseman may, and if required by the shipowner must, sell the goods (g) and apply the proceeds in the following order, namely:—(1) in payment, if the goods are sold for home use, of any customs or excise duties that may be owing; (2) in payment of the expenses of the sale; (3) in payment, if there is no agreement between the shipowner and the wharfinger or warehouseman as to priority, of the rent, rates, and other charges (h) due to the wharfinger or ware-

(t) The owner must be ready at the time of his offer (Berresford v. Montgomerie (1864), 17 C. B. (N. S.) 379).

(b) It has been held that the goods must have been landed under M. S. Act, 1894, s. 493 (see the text, supra), otherwise the lien is not preserved (Smailes & Son v. Hans Dessen & Co. (1905), 11 Com. Cas. 74; varied (1906), 12 Com. Cas. 117, C. A., without expression of opinion on this point).

(d) This means the occupier of a warehouse as defined in note (o), p. 281, ante (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 492).

(e) As to the effect of wilfully inserting an excessive amount, see Miedbrodt v. Fitzsimon, The "Energie" (1875), L. R. 6 P. C. 306. For forms of notice, see Encyclopædia of Forms and Precedents, Vol. XIV., pp. 127, 128.

(f) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 494. The wharfinger or warehouseman is not bound to inquire into the validity of any lien claimed by the shipowner (ibid., s. 500). As to the modes of discharging the lien, see pp. 287, 288, post.

(g) M. S. Act. 1894, s. 497 (1).

(h) Under ibid., s. 449, the wharfinger or warehouseman is entitled to rent; he is authorised to protect and preserve the goods at their owner's expense, and is given a lien for the rent and expenses. Apart from this provision it does not appear that he has any lien (Mors-le-Blanch v. Wilson (1873), L. R. 8 C. P. 227, per BRETT, J., at p. 239; compare Somes v. British Empire Shipping Co. (1860), 8 H. L. Cas. 338); nor does it seem that he can claim his expenses from the owner of the goods, since houseman; (4) in payment of the amount due to the shipowner (i). Any surplus is to be paid over to the owner of the goods (k).

Time for sale.

383. If the goods are perishable, the wharfinger or warehouseman may sell them when he thinks fit; otherwise his power of sale does not arise until after the expiration of ninety days from the time when the goods were placed in his custody (l). The sale must be by public auction (m), and must be advertised in two newspapers, and notice must be sent to the owner of the goods, if his address is known (n).

SUB-SECT. 4.—Lien.

Shipowner's lien.

384. The shipowner is entitled to withhold delivery of the cargo until all existing liens upon it have been discharged (o). If in the lawful exercise of a lien the ship is detained beyond the time allowed for discharge, the shipowner is not precluded from recovering demurrage or damages for detention by reason of the fact that the detention is caused by his own act (p). A lien may arise either at common law (q) or by express contract (r).

For freight.

385. At common law there is a lien for freight, if payable contemporaneously with the delivery of the goods (s), but not, in the absence of contract, if the freight is payable at any other time, whether before delivery, as in the case of advance freight (t), or after the expenses of enforcing a security do not necessarily fall upon the person liable to pay the original debt (Somes v. British Empire Shipping Co. (1860), 8 H. L. Cas. 338).

(i) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 498. If there is any agreement as to priority, the priority as between the shipowner and the wharfinger or warehouseman will be determined by the terms of the agreement (ibid.).

(s) See p. 303, post. It is immaterial whether the ship is a general ship or whether she is chartered (Abbott on Shipping, 5th ed., p. 247; 14th ed., p. 563; Anon. (Case 779) (1699), 12 Mod. delivery (a). Moreover, there is no lien if the payment of freight does not depend upon delivery, as, for instance, where it is made payable "lost or not lost" (b).

Goods affected.

The lien extends over all goods consigned in the same bottom on the same voyage (c) to the same consignee (d), and exists as long as any of the freight payable in respect of them remains unpaid (e). The shipowner need not, however, retain the whole of the goods; he may deliver them by instalments upon payment of the freight due upon each instalment (f); or if he has already delivered some instalments without requiring payment, he may retain the balance until the whole freight is paid (g). It is immaterial that the goods are comprised in several bills of lading (h), unless the goods are being carried to different destinations (i), or unless the bills of lading have been indorsed to different persons (k).

For general average etc.

386. The shipowner has also a lien at common law for general average contributions (l), and for the expenses incurred on behalf

Where a portion of the freight has been paid in advance there is a lien for the balance (Yates v. Railston (1818), 2 Moore (C. P.), 294). This lien has priority over an unpaid seller's lien (Oppenheim v. Russell (1802), 3 Bos. & P. 42), and, in the case of transhipment, over a previous respondentia bond (Cleary v. McAndrew, Cargo ex "Galam" (1863), 2 Moo. of the cargo owner at a port of refuge in the interests of the cargo (m).

387. There is no lien at common law for any other charges (n). The shipowner has therefore no lien for freight not payable on delivery (o), for dead freight (p), for demurrage (q), or damages for detention (r), for pilotage or any other charges which the shipper has agreed to pay (s), for freight due on previous voyages (t), or for any other debts due to the shipowner (a). Any such lien must be created by special contract (b), and is then valid and enforceable (c). Thus, there may be a lien by agreement for advance freight (d), dead freight (e), or demurrage at the port of loading (f), or for any other charges (g), including unpaid freight due in respect of previous voyages (h) and strike expenses (i).

By express contract.

388. Where express liens are conferred upon the shipowner by the terms of a charterparty, the holder of the bill of lading, if he is not the charterer (j), is not subject to such liens, unless they are incorporated in the bill of lading (k). Mere notice of the charterparty is not sufficient (l). Moreover, any reference in the bill of lading to the charterparty is strictly construed (m). Unless, therefore, the language used in the bill of lading is wide enough to extend the shipowner's rights, the holder of the bill of lading is entitled to have his goods delivered to him upon payment of the freight reserved by the bill of lading (n); as against him there is no lien for freight payable under the charterparty in respect of the same (o) or other goods (p), or for the difference, if any, between the bill of lading freight and the chartered freight (q), or for dead freight (r), or for demurrage at the port of loading (s). R. 46; The Stornoway (1882), 4 Asp. M. L. C. 529). The charterparty may, however, give the shipowner a lien over all sub-freights, in which case the lien must be exercised before the sub-freight is paid over to the charterer (Tagart, Beaton & Co. v. Fisher (James) & Sons, [1903] 1 K. R. 2 Sc. & Div. 128; Kish v. Taylor, supra). The consignee may also be liable under his own contract with the charterer, in which case his liability is measured by that contract, and not by the charterparty, even though incorporated into the bill of lading (Houlder Brothers & Co., Ltd. v. Public Works Commissioner, Public Works Commissioner v. Houlder Brothers & Co., Ltd., [1908] A. or is his real principal (a), or where the shipper was guilty of bad faith (b).

Duration of lien.

389. The lien remains as long as the shipowner continues in possession of the goods (c). If, however, he lands and warehouses them (d), he risks losing his lien (e), apart from statute (f), although it revives if he resumes possession (g).

Discharge of lien.

Statutory provisions.

390. The lien is discharged by payment (h) or tender of payment (i) of the amount due. Where goods imported from abroad are landed and warehoused under statute (k), it is expressly provided that any lien is to be discharged—(1) upon production to the wharfinger or warehouseman of a receipt for the amount claimed, and delivery to him of a copy or of a release from the shipowner; or (2) upon the deposit by the owner of the goods with the wharfinger or warehouseman of the amount claimed, in which case the discharge is without prejudice to any other remedy for the recovery of the freight (l). The person making the deposit may within fifteen days give the wharfinger or warehouseman notice in writing to retain it, stating the amount, if any, which he admits to be due (m). If no such notice is given, the amount deposited is at the expiration of fifteen days to be paid over to the shipowner (n); but, if the notice is given, the wharfinger or warehouseman must at once inform the shipowner and pay or tender the amount, if any, admitted to be due, retaining the balance, or the whole, as the case may be, for thirty days (o). At the expiration of this period he is to pay the money in his hands to the owner of the goods, unless legal proceedings have been instituted to determine the dispute between the shipowner and the owner of the goods and notice in writing of such proceedings has been served upon him (p). Any payment made by the wharfinger or warehouseman in accordance with these provisions discharges him from liability for the amount paid (q).

SECT. 5. The Unloading.

Loss of lien.

391. The shipowner's lien is lost when he parts with the possession of the goods, unless he is induced to do so by fraud (r). It is also lost where he agrees to take a bill for the amount (s), unless the bill is afterwards dishonoured before the goods are actually delivered (a); he is, however, entitled to exercise his lien until the bill is given (b).

Agent's lien.

392. An agent to whom the bill of lading is handed for the purpose of enabling him to obtain possession of the goods has an implied authority to bind his principal by agreeing on his behalf to pay any charges in respect of which a lien over the goods exists (c), and any such agent has himself a lien over the bill of lading for his charges (d).

SUB-SECT. 5.—The Measure of Damages.

What constitutes breach of contract.

393. It is the duty of the shipowner to deliver at the port of discharge all the goods entrusted to him (e) in accordance with the terms of his contract (f). In the absence of any lawful excuse (g), he is guilty of a breach of this duty, and becomes liable to pay damages (h) to the consignee in the following cases, namely:—(1) where he fails to arrive at the port of discharge within the time contemplated (i); (2) where he fails, wholly or in part, to deliver the goods (j); and (3) where he delivers the goods, but, owing to some cause for which he is responsible, they are in a damaged condition (k).

(p) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 496 (3).

(q) Ibid., s. 496 (4). When the deposit is made by an agent employed by the owner of the cargo to take delivery, the shipowner may sue the agent alone for a declaration that he is entitled to a lien (Euterpe Steamship Co., Ltd. v. Bath & Son (1897), 2 Com. Cas. 196, following White & Co. v. Furness, Withy & Co., [1895] A. C. 40). The owner of the cargo may be added as a defendant, under R. S. C., Ord. 16, r. 11, for the purpose of counterclaiming (Montgomery v. Foy, Morgan & Co., [1895] 2 Q. B. 321, C. A.); see titles PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE, Vol. XXIII., p. 105; SET-OFF AND COUNTERCLAIM, Vol. XXV., p. 481.

(k) See p. 291, post.

Delay on voyage.

394. Where, though the goods are ultimately delivered undamaged (l), the ship is unreasonably delayed on her voyage to the port of discharge, the measure of damages is in general the interest on the value of the goods during the period of delay (m). The consignee is not, as a general rule, entitled to include in his damages any loss due to an accidental fall in prices (n); and, since the principles applicable to carriage by land (o) do not apply to carriage by sea (p), he cannot recover the difference between the value of his goods at the time when they ought to have arrived and their value at the time when they did arrive (q). If, however, the circumstances permit the arrival of the ship to be calculated with the same degree of probability as in the case of carriage by land, the consignee may, where the goods are sent to be sold at a particular market (r), or in a particular season (s), or where it is known that the price will vary according to the time of their arrival (t), or where the delay must necessarily affect their value (a), recover the difference, as being part of the damages within the contemplation of the parties (b).

Non-delivery of cargo.

395. Where the goods are not delivered at all, owing to their loss on the way (c), the measure of damages is the value of the goods at the port of destination at the time when they should have been delivered (d). If there is an available market, their market value at that time must be taken; but a deduction must be made for the freight and other charges which the consignee would, if the goods had arrived safely, have had to pay in order to obtain them (e). Since, however, the damages are measured by the difference between the consignee's position according as the goods are safely delivered or lost, no deduction is to be made for any advance freight already paid; in respect of such freight his position is the same whether the goods are delivered or not, and it cannot therefore be taken into account (f). If there is no available market, the value of the goods to the consignee at the port of discharge must be arrived at by an estimate; and the consignee will be allowed to recover the cost price of the goods, together with any advance freight or other charges already paid in connexion with the transport of the goods (g), and the estimated profit which would have been made if they had arrived safely at their destination (h).

SECT. 5. The Unloading.

Special damage.

396. In either case the value of the goods is to be taken independently of any circumstances peculiar to the consignee (i). If, therefore, he has already contracted to sell the goods, the contract price is to be disregarded, whether it is higher (k) or lower (l) than the market price or estimated value, as the case may be. Similarly, where the loss of the goods prevents him from making use of other property, as, for instance, where the loss of a piece of machinery delays the erection of a mill, he is not entitled to add to his damages the loss of the profit which he would otherwise have earned (m). The shipowner may, however, by his contract undertake liability for damage arising from the peculiar circumstances of the case (n).

Damage limited by contract.

397. The contract may by its terms define the basis upon which the damages are to be measured, as, for instance, where it provides that the shipowner is not to be liable beyond the net invoice cost of the goods (o). In addition, his liability may be limited to a specified sum (p). This limitation of liability does not apply where the loss is attributable to the original unseaworthiness of the ship (q), or where the loss occurs after an unjustifiable deviation (r), in either of which cases he is liable for the full amount of the loss. It applies, however, to loss occasioned by any other cause, including negligence (s), and, where such is the intention of the parties, may extend even to loss occasioned by unseaworthiness (t). The contract may also entitle the consignee in the case of short delivery to deduct the value of the goods short delivered from the freight payable on delivery of the balance (a); but in the absence of any provision to that effect he is not entitled to do so (b).

Indemnification aliunde.

398. Upon whatever basis the damages are calculated, the consignee is not entitled to recover more than he has actually lost (c); he must, therefore, give the shipowner credit for all sums received from other persons by way of indemnification for his loss (d). This principle does not, however, apply to sums received by the consignee from insurers (e). The shipowner is not entitled to have the existence of any insurance upon the goods taken into account; and the insurers, if they have already paid the consignee, succeed by subrogation to his rights against the shipowner (f).

Delivery of goods damaged.

399. Where the goods are delivered in a damaged condition the measure of damages is, in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary (g), the difference between the value which the goods would have had if they had been delivered undamaged (h) and the price for which they were or could have been sold on the day of arrival in their actual condition (i). The shipowner is not, as a general rule, responsible for such deterioration as necessarily follows from the nature of the goods and the duration of the transit (k); where, however, the voyage is unreasonably delayed he may be responsible for the deterioration during the period of delay (l).

In the case of damaged goods the contract frequently provides that all claims against the shipowner must be made within a specified time (m).

SECT. 6. The Payment of Freight.

freight is the shipper of the goods (n). His liability exists independently of any charterparty (o) or bill of lading (p), since in the absence of anything to show the contrary (q) a contract to pay freight is to be implied from the mere fact that he has placed the goods upon another person's ship for the purpose of being carried to their destination (r). It is therefore unnecessary to take into consideration the actual ownership of the goods (s). The shipper is equally liable to pay freight, although he never owned the goods at all, but shipped them solely on behalf of a third person (t), unless the facts of the case show that he acted to the knowledge of the shipowner as agent only, in which case the person on whose behalf he acted is in reality the shipper and liable for the freight accordingly (a). Similarly, where the shipper is, at the time of shipment, the owner of the goods, he cannot, by subsequently transferring the ownership of them before any freight has become payable, discharge himself from the liability to pay it when due (b).

Shipment on own ship.

Where a person ships goods upon his own ship no contract to pay freight can be implied (c), since he is at the same time both shipowner and shipper (d). A person, therefore, to whom he has, as shipowner, transferred the ship during the course of the voyage cannot call upon him, in his capacity as shipper (e), to pay freight when his goods have reached their destination (f).

Effect of charterparty.

The existence of a charterparty, by which an obligation to pay freight is imposed on the charterer (g), does not, where the shipper is not the charterer, take away the shipper's liability in respect of freight (h), unless, from the circumstances of the case, it is clear that the shipper has contracted solely with the charterer (i).

Effect of bill of lading.

401. The liability of the shipper is not affected by the issue of a bill of lading unless it contains a cesser clause (k). It is immaterial whether under the bill of lading the goods are made deliverable to the shipper himself (l) or to a third person (m), since in both cases the contract of carriage is made with the shipper alone (n). The shipper cannot, therefore, by any subsequent dealings with the bill of lading, defeat the shipowner's right as against himself to demand payment of the freight (o). The effect of such dealings may be to give the shipowner an additional right to demand payment from a third person (p), but the shipper's liability remains unchanged (q); nor is his liability taken away by the insertion of a term in the bill of lading expressly providing for payment of the freight by the person who takes delivery of the goods (r). Such a term is inserted for the benefit of the shipowner, who is thereby entitled to withhold delivery until payment; it is not intended to exonerate the shipper from liability. Its effect is merely to give the shipowner an option to demand payment from the person to whom he delivers the goods (a). He is not, as against the shipper, bound to exercise his option, and the shipper remains liable, notwithstanding that the shipowner has delivered the goods without demanding payment of the freight from the consignee (b). Payment of the freight by the consignee, however, discharges the shipper from any further liability (c); and he is equally discharged where the shipowner indicates his intention to discharge him by his conduct in giving exclusive credit to the consignee (d) or otherwise (e).

Liability of charterer.

402. Where the ship on which the goods are carried is working under a charterparty, the liability to pay the freight reserved by the charterparty (f) falls, in the first instance, upon the charterer (g). This liability depends upon the special contract contained in the charterparty, by the terms of which it is regulated (h), and is personal to the charterer (i). An assignment of the benefit of a charterparty to a third person (k) does not of itself, therefore, defeat the shipowner's right to claim payment of the chartered freight from the charterer (l). To have this effect the assignment must be assented to by the shipowner (m); and, in addition, it must be manifest, from the terms of his assent, that he has accepted the substitution of liability, and not merely agreed to the performance of the charterer's obligations by the assignee (n).

SECT. 6. The Payment of Freight.

Ownership of goods immaterial.

In accordance with the same principles the charterer's liability to pay the chartered freight does not depend upon his relation to the goods in respect of which it is claimed (o). The fact that he shipped them as agent only on behalf of their owner is immaterial (p), if his liability under the charterparty is otherwise clear (q). It is equally immaterial that the goods were shipped by a third person and not by the charterer himself (r). It therefore follows that the existence of an alternative liability in a third person to pay freight equivalent to that reserved by the charterparty, as, for instance, where such person is the actual shipper (s) or holder of the bill of lading (t), is to be disregarded. The charterer is not entitled to insist upon the shipowner enforcing such alternative liability against another rather than against him (a), and is not discharged by the shipowner's failure to do so (b). He is, however, entitled to the benefit of any payment made to the shipowner by any other person liable to pay for the carriage of the goods (c).

Cesser clause.

403. Where the charterparty contains a cesser clause (d) the liability of the charterer to pay chartered freight is intended to cease when the prescribed cargo has been shipped (e). He is not necessarily, however, discharged wholly from his liability, since the extent of his discharge depends upon the scope of the cesser clause and the manner in which its stipulations have been discharged (f). Moreover, the effect of a cesser clause, when fully operative, is only to discharge the charterer from his liability as such. If at the same time he is liable in another capacity, as, for instance, where he holds the bill of lading, his liability in that capacity remains unchanged (g).

Where consignee liable.

404. The consignee is not, as such, liable to pay freight, since he is not a party to the contract of carriage (h). Where there is a bill of lading in which he is named as consignee, or which has been indorsed to him, he is by statute expressly made liable to pay freight as if he were a party to the contract contained in the bill of lading, provided that the property in the goods carried has passed to him (i). His statutory liability, however, depends upon his ownership of the goods, and does not arise where, though he is named as consignee in the bill of lading, or where he becomes indorsee thereof, the property in the goods does not pass to him thereby (k). Such a consignee is an agent only, whose duty it is to take delivery on behalf of the owner of the goods (l). Since, however, the shipowner has a right to withhold delivery until the freight has been paid (m), the receipt of the goods by the consignee in such a case, though it does not of itself create any obligation to pay freight (n), may amount to evidence of a new contract, distinct from the contract of carriage, whereby the consignee, in consideration of the shipowner giving up his lien, agrees to pay him the freight (o). Whether this new contract exists or not is a question of fact, to be determined by reference to the circumstances of the particular case (p). The conduct of the consignee, and in particular his previous dealings with the shipowner (q), and, perhaps, his usual course of business (r), must be such as to lead to the inference that his receipt of the goods was in pursuance of the new contract, and not merely in discharge of his duty to his principal (s). Though the receipt of the goods may, in the absence of any explanation, be sufficient (t), no such inference is to be drawn where, at the time when the consignee received the goods, he was known by the shipowner to be acting as agent for their owner and the delivery was made to him in that capacity (a).

The statute does not apply where there is no bill of lading (b). In such a case, however, the conduct of the consignee in taking delivery of the goods may lead to the inference that, in consideration of the delivery, the consignee has contracted to pay the freight (c).

Indorsee of bill of lading.

405. A person to whom the bill of lading is indorsed and who takes delivery under it (d) is, by statute, liable to pay freight to the shipowner, provided that the effect of the indorsement (e) is to pass the property in the goods carried (f). If the property in the goods does not pass to him he incurs no liability merely by reason of the indorsement (g), though, by reason of the circumstances attendant upon his receipt of the goods, he may render himself liable under a new contract in the same way as the consignee (h).

SUB-SECT. 2.—The Person to whom Payment should be Made.

(b) The Bills of Lading Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), deals only with bills of lading.

(i) Atkinson v. Cotesworth (1825), 3 B. & C. 647; Walshe v. Provan (1853), 8 Exch. 843. If the freight is expressly made payable to a third person, and not to the shipowner, in an action to recover it brought in the name of the shipowner payment to the shipowner or master is no defence (Kirchner v. Venus (1859), 12 Moo. P. C. C. 361, 399). The receipt of freight by the obligee of a bottomry bond is in law a receipt by the shipowner (Benson v. Chapman (1849), 2 H. L. Cas. 696).

SECT. 6. The Payment of Freight.

and the right to receive freight is one of the incidents of ownership (k). Payment need not be made to the shipowner himself; it is sufficient if it is made to an agent authorised to receive it (l). The master has an implied authority to receive payment of the freight (m), and, when the contract under which it is payable is contained in a bill of lading signed by him (n), he may, as being a party to the contract (o), sue the person liable to pay it (p); he cannot, however, claim to receive it as against the shipowner (q), who may at any time revoke his authority to receive it, either expressly (r) or impliedly, by appointing another person as his agent in that behalf (s).

Where ship is chartered.

407. Where the ship on which the goods are carried has been chartered from the shipowner, there are two classes of freight which call for consideration, namely, the freight reserved under the charterparty and the freight payable under the bill of lading (t). As regards the shipowner's right to receive from the charterer the chartered freight, no question arises (a). Where, however, the bill of lading is in the hands of a third person, who is liable, as holder, to pay freight (b), payment of the bill of lading freight may be claimed both by the charterer and by the shipowner. As against the charterer the right of the shipowner depends upon whether he can establish the existence of a contract between himself and the holder of the bill of lading, under which he is entitled to receive the bill of lading freight (c). If the charterparty amounts to a demise (d), the contract under the bill of lading is made with the charterer, and the shipowner cannot therefore claim the freight (e).

(k) A part-owner may sue for the freight on behalf of himself and the other part-owners (De Hart v. Stephenson (1876), 1 Q. B. D. 313). But a part-owner who objects to a particular voyage is not entitled as against the others to any of the freight earned on that voyage (Boson v. Sandford (1689), Carth. 58).

(l) The Edmond (1860), Lush. 211. As against the shipowner a ship's husband who is authorised to receive freight may deduct his disbursements (Harris v. Reynolds (1856), 4 W. SECT. 6. The Payment of Freight.

In any other case the bill of lading is usually sufficient evidence of a contract with the shipowner, since, notwithstanding the existence of the charterparty, the contract of carriage is, as a general rule, to be regarded, so far as the holder of the bill of lading is concerned, as made between the shipowner and himself (f). At the same time, as between the shipowner and the charterer, their respective rights depend upon the terms of the charterparty (g). The shipowner, therefore, may, according to the circumstances of the case, be entitled to retain the whole of the bill of lading freight for his own benefit (h), or he may be bound to account to the charterer for at least some portion of it (i). In the latter case, the charterer may give notice to the holder of the bill of lading not to pay the shipowner the portion due to himself, and thus deprive the shipowner of his right to claim the whole (k).

Rights of charterer against consignee.

408. Where goods are carried on a chartered ship under a bill of lading, the charterer is not entitled to claim payment of the freight due under the bill of lading from the person who may be liable to pay it as consignee or holder of the bill of lading (l), unless the charterparty is a complete demise, or it appears from the form of the bill of lading that the contract of carriage contained therein was made with the charterer and not with the shipowner (m), or unless the existence of a special contract to pay the freight to the charterer is established (n).

Sale of ship.

409. Where, after entering into a contract of carriage, the shipowner sells the ship upon which the goods are being carried, the purchaser becomes, in the absence of express contract, entitled,

See also Hoyland & Co. v. Graham & Co. (1896), 1 Com. Cas. 274, where the shipowner and shipper entered into a new contract at a higher rate of freight than that agreed between charterer and shipper, and it was held that the shipowner was bound to account only for the difference between the chartered freight and the freight originally agreed upon between the charterer and the shipper.

as from the date of the sale (o), to receive all freight which is then in course of being earned by the ship and which does not become payable till afterwards (p). At the time when the freight falls due the purchaser is in fact the owner of the ship, and takes the freight as being incidental to the property in the ship (q). Payment of the freight to the purchaser by the person liable is therefore a valid payment (r), though the contract under which it is payable does not, strictly speaking, pass with the property in the ship (s), but requires to be expressly assigned (t).

Mortgage of ship.

410. A transfer of the ship by way of mortgage (a) does not of itself entitle the mortgagee, as against the mortgagor, to claim the freight earned by the employment of the ship (b). The mortgagor, so long as he remains in possession, is not divested of his rights as owner, and his right to control the employment of the ship and to receive the freight to be earned thereby therefore continues (c). By the mortgage, however, the mortgagee is empowered to take possession (d). Upon taking possession he becomes owner of the ship to the exclusion of the mortgagor, and is entitled as such to claim payment of the freight (e). His right to the freight depends, not upon the existence of the mortgage (f), but solely upon the fact that he is in possession as owner at the time when the freight becomes payable (g). Any payment of freight made to the mortgagor by the person liable to pay it is valid as against the mortgagee, if made before the mortgagee takes possession (h). It is therefore necessary, for the purpose of acquiring a right to the freight, that the mortgagee should actually take possession (i), or, at least, that he should do some act equivalent thereto (k). Where the ship is at sea, notice to the consignee, as holder of the bill of lading, that the mortgagee intends to take possession and to collect the freight himself is sufficient, provided that the mortgagee completes his right by taking possession as soon as possible (l).

What freight passes to mortgagee.

The freight to which the mortgagee becomes entitled is the freight which is payable in respect of the goods on board the ship at the time when he takes possession (m). He does not succeed to the contractual rights of the mortgagor, but only to his rights as shipowner (n). Any freight, therefore, which may still be owing in respect of goods carried on a former voyage does not pass to the mortgagee in possession (o). Even the freight which has been earned on the voyage in the course of which he takes possession does not pass to him if before he does so the goods have been delivered to the consignee (p). Where, however, he takes possession before the delivery is complete, he may be entitled to receive the whole freight, including the freight for the portion already delivered, if, on the construction of the charterparty or bill of lading, the court is of opinion that no freight is payable until the whole of the goods has been delivered (q).

Amount payable.

Though the mortgagee cannot, on taking possession, avail himself of the contractual rights of the mortgagor against the consignee, but must rely upon his lien over the goods, he is nevertheless bound, as against the consignee, by the terms of the contract of carriage (r). He cannot, therefore, claim to be paid freight at a higher rate than that which the consignee agreed to pay (s), and must allow the consignee credit for all payments made on account of freight, whether by way of advance freight (t) or otherwise (a). Such payments must, however, have been made in accordance with the terms of the contract of carriage; no credit need be given for payments which fall outside its terms and are made in pursuance of a separate arrangement with the mortgagor (b).

and claim payment of the freight is not restricted to the case of the first mortgagee (c). The right of the first mortgagee is paramount (d); but, subject thereto and to the rights of any prior incumbrancers (e), any subsequent mortgagee has, as against all other persons, a right to take possession, which right he may enforce, if necessary, by obtaining the appointment of a receiver (f).

When insurers entitled to freight.

412. Where during the course of the voyage the ship on which the goods are being carried suffers a constructive total loss and is abandoned to the insurers on ship (g), any freight which may become payable by reason of the ship being able to carry the goods to their destination (h) belongs to the insurers (i), since the effect of the abandonment is to place them, to this extent at least, in the position of the shipowner (k). If, however, the freight cannot be earned owing to the extent to which the ship is damaged, the rights of the shipowner against the persons who may be responsible for the loss of freight do not pass to the insurers on ship (l), but to the insurers on freight, if any (m); nor can the insurers on ship claim the freight if it is earned by the shipowner exercising his right of transhipment and forwarding the goods by another ship to their destination (n).

The insurers are, like other transferees of the ship, bound, as regards their claim for freight, by the contracts of the shipowner (o). Where, however, the goods which are being carried on the ship belong to the shipowner, and after the abandonment are carried to their destination on the same ship, the insurers, though they cannot claim freight on the whole voyage, are entitled to be paid at the usual rate for the use of the ship from the place where she was abandoned to her destination (p).

Assignment of freight.

the contract under which it is payable, whether before (r) or after (s) it has become due. He may also assign future freight, that is to say, the freight which the ship may earn on future voyages as to which no contracts have been made at the date of the assignment (t).

Set-off.

Since the assignment is subject to equities (a), the assignee takes the freight subject to the right of the person liable to pay it to set off any debts due from the shipowner to himself at the time when notice of the assignment was given (b). Where, however, the assignee is in a position to exercise a lien for the freight (c), the set-off cannot be made available (d); nor is it available where the debt in respect of which it is claimed did not accrue till after the date of the notice (e).

Equitable assignment.

If the assignment is equitable only, the assignee, though entitled to call upon the shipowner to account for any freight which he may have received (f), cannot claim payment of the freight from the holder of the bill of lading, unless he has given him notice of the assignment (g). By thus giving notice the assignee will defeat the claim of any prior equitable assignee who has failed to do so (h). Such notice is, however, ineffectual against a subsequent legal assignee (i), or against a person who claims the freight by notice of a subsequent sale (k) or legal mortgage (l) of the ship. But the mortgagee must have taken possession; see The Benwell Tower (1895), 72 L. T. 664 (where the first mortgagee became assignee of the freight after the second mortgage, and was held entitled to retain the freight paid to him under the assignment, neither mortgagee having taken possession).

the second mortgagee has done so, takes priority, since the interests of both are equitable (m).

A legal assignee of the freight, though he is not deprived of his right to receive the freight by a subsequent sale or mortgage of the ship (n), cannot claim it when the assignment was made after the sale of the ship, since the assignor has no right to receive the freight, and therefore nothing passes by the assignment (o). If, however, the ship only is mortgaged, a subsequent legal assignment is not wholly inoperative, since it entitles the assignee to the freight, unless the mortgagee takes possession (p). As soon as the mortgagee takes possession any freight remaining due becomes payable to him (q), and the assignment is therefore to that extent defeated (r).

Effect of sale or mortgage of ship.

414. A person who has a maritime lien against a ship, such as, for instance, a lien for damage arising out of collision (s) or for wages (a), has the same lien against the freight. Similarly, the obligee of a bottomry bond which includes the freight has a lien against the freight, and payment to him discharges the person liable as against the shipowner (b).

Maritime lien.

SUB-SECT. 3.—When the Freight is Payable.

415. The bill of lading usually provides that the freight is to be paid on delivery of the goods to which it relates (c). This provision is unnecessary, as, in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary (d), freight is by law payable on delivery (e). The shipowner is not, however, bound to deliver before payment, since payment and delivery are concurrent acts (f). The consignee must therefore be prepared to pay the freight, if the shipowner so requires, at the time of delivery (g), and is not entitled to insist on delivery without tendering the freight (h). A delivery of a portion of the goods comprised in the bill of lading without requiring payment of the freight does not preclude the shipowner from refusing to deliver the balance until the freight is paid (i), if, at least, the goods are of such a nature that there must be a series of deliveries (k).

Arrival of goods necessary.

416. In accordance with the same principle, the shipowner is not entitled to insist on the payment of freight unless he is in a position to deliver the goods (l). Freight is not earned unless and until the shipowner's contract is substantially performed by the carriage and arrival of the goods ready to be delivered to the consignee (m). It is therefore necessary that the goods should have been carried by the shipowner (n) to their destination, that is, to the port of discharge specified in the contract (o), or to some other port at which, under the contract, the consignee is bound to take delivery (p).

Ability to deliver.

417. The shipowner must remain in a position to deliver the goods until the expiration of the time within which the consignee is bound to take delivery (q). If the consignee fails to take delivery within such time, the shipowner is entitled to claim freight notwithstanding the non-delivery (r). Moreover, a refusal on the part of the shipowner to deliver the goods until any liens which he may have over them are discharged (s) is not a breach of the contract of carriage, and does not, therefore, preclude him from claiming freight (t), though it may discharge the consignee from the obligation of tendering it (a).

Failure to deliver.

418. Where the shipowner fails to carry the goods to their destination, he has not fulfilled the condition which entitles him to be paid freight (b). He cannot, therefore, in the absence of a contract to that effect (c), claim the whole or any portion of the freight (d). The cause of his failure is immaterial, whether it is the loss of the goods (e) or the loss of the ship, and his consequent inability to complete the voyage (f). The ship or goods may have been lost by perils of the seas (g); the goods may have been sold by the master at an intermediate port (h); the ship or goods may have been captured by the enemy (i), or seized under an embargo (k). SECT. 6. The Payment of Freight.

defect (l), no freight can be earned, and the shipowner is not entitled to be remunerated even for the portion of the voyage for which the goods have in fact been carried (m). Similarly, the loss of the goods after their arrival, but before their delivery to the consignee, precludes the shipowner from claiming freight (n), unless the consignee is already in default by failing to take delivery within the proper time (o).

Part delivery.

419. If part only of the goods are lost, the shipowner is entitled to be paid freight on such of the goods as are delivered (p). Moreover, the fact that the goods which arrive do so in a damaged condition does not necessarily deprive the shipowner of his right to claim freight on them (q). It is immaterial that their condition is attributable to the default of the master or crew (r), or that, in consequence of the damage, they are worth less than the freight (s). They must, however, arrive in specie (t); the cargo contracted to be carried must substantially have arrived (a). If the nature of the cargo is altered and it is no longer merchantable under its original description (b), there is, in effect, a total loss of the cargo (c), and, therefore, no freight is payable.

Goods forwarded.

420. Where, in the course of the voyage, the ship in which the goods are being carried is lost, but the goods are saved, the shipowner is entitled to forward them by some other means to their destination (d), and thus earn the freight (e). If, however, he does

421. Even where the goods have been delivered to the consignee no freight is payable if the contract under which it was earned is unlawful (k).

T. 145 (where the cargo owner wrongfully took possession of the cargo and thus prevented it from being forwarded). The shipowner is entitled to the full freight, even though he tranships the goods at a lower rate of freight (Shipton v. Thornton (1838), 9 Ad. & El. 314, where the court declined to express an opinion as to the position if the shipowner had been compelled to pay a higher rate of freight, but suggested that it might be the master's duty in such a case to contract as agent for the cargo owner; see p. 238, ante).

Where the ship is chartered for a round voyage, and is lost on the homeward voyage, the obligation of the charterer to pay freight depends upon whether the outward and homeward voyages are distinct, or whether, by the terms of the charterparty, there is only one voyage (Abbott on Shipping, 5th ed., pp. 332, 333; 14th ed., pp. 742 et seq.; Malyne, Lex Mercatoria, 98; Mackrell v. Simond (1776), 2 Chit. 666).

B. 499). Interest on unpaid freight is not payable (Merchant Shipping Co. v. Armitage (1873), L. R. 9 Q. B. 99, 114, Ex. Ch.), but there may be a special agreement to pay it (E. Clemens Horst & Co. v. Norfolk and North-Western American Steam Shipping Co. (1906), 11 Com. Cas. 141). Payment of freight may be the amount of goods delivered to the consignee (o). So long as the goods contracted to be carried have been delivered, no deduction can be made from the freight because they have been delivered in a damaged condition (p), though, if sued for the freight, the consignee may counterclaim in respect of the damage (q). The contract may, however, expressly provide for deductions to be made, in which case the consignee's right to make such deductions may depend upon the shipowner's conduct, and upon the question whether the damage is attributable to an excepted peril (r).

Rate of payment.

423. The contract under which the goods are carried usually provides for payment of the freight at a specified rate per unit of weight or measurement (s). If no rate is specified, freight must nevertheless be paid at the ordinary rate in force at the time when the goods are put on board (t). Where, however, the bill of lading expressly provides that the goods are to be carried freight free (a), as, for instance, where they are shipped on the shipowner's account (b), no freight is payable in any circumstances, notwithstanding that the

(s) Where a ship is chartered to carry particular goods at a specified rate, and other goods are shipped, the charterer must pay the same freight as if the ship had been loaded in accordance with the charterparty (Capper v. Forster (1837), 3 Bing. (N. C.) 938; Cockburn v. Alexander (1848), 6 C. B. 791). As to alternative methods of calculating the freight in certain events, see Gibbens v. Buisson (1834), 1 Bing. (N. C.) 283; Fenwick v. Boyd (1846), 15 M. & W. 632. For the effect of a stipulation to pay the highest freight paid on the same voyage, see Gether v. Capper (1856), 18 C. B. 866. There may be a special agreement to pay a higher freight than that reserved by the bill of lading (Hedley v. Lapage (1816), Holt (N. P.), 392 (where the goods were to be smuggled into Russia)). The rate of freight specified is not affected by an authorised variation of the charterparty by an agent of the charterer, even though such variation is prejudicial to the charterer (Wiggins v. Johnston (1845), 14 M. & W. 609).

(t) Gumm v. Tyrie (1865), 6 B. & S. 298, Ex. Ch.; Keith v. Burrows (1877), 2 App. Cas. 636, per Lord CAIRNS, L.C., at p. 646.

B. 538, where the charterparty provided for payment of a certain freight in full for the voyage, and it was held that no extra freight was payable in respect of cargoes carried between intermediate ports.

(b) But if the bill of lading specifies a substantial rate of freight, the fact that the goods are shipped on account of the shipowner does not preclude an assignee of the freight from recovering the full amount (Weguelin v. Cellier (1873), L. R. 6 H. L. 286, where the shipper was held not to be goods have been sold and the bill of lading transferred to the buyer (c). A purchaser of the ship (d), therefore, or a mortgagee who takes possession (e), cannot refuse to deliver the goods to the holder of the bill of lading until freight is paid, since each is bound by the contract made by the shipowner (f). It is immaterial that the contract under which the goods are sold and the bill of lading transferred provide for the payment to the shipowner of a specified sum under the name of freight in addition to the specified price, since such sum is not in reality freight, but must be considered as a portion of the price (g).

When measurement to be taken.

424. For the purpose of ascertaining the freight to be paid upon such goods as are delivered, it is necessary for their weight or measurement to be taken (h). Wherever there is a difference between the weight or measurement at the port of loading and at the port of discharge, whether such difference is due to mistake (i) or to the expansion or wasting of the goods during the voyage, or to the method of calculation adopted, the question arises as to which weight or measurement is to be the basis of calculating the freight. In the absence of any provision in the contract, freight is, as a general rule (k), payable on that amount alone which is put on board, carried throughout the whole voyage, and delivered at the end to the consignee (l). If, therefore, the goods have increased in weight or bulk, the freight is to be calculated upon the quantities put on board the ship at the port of loading (m); if, on the other hand, they have decreased, it is to be calculated upon the quantities delivered at the port of discharge (n). If, however, the terms of the contract are explicit (o) the general rule is disregarded, and the quantities, either at the port of loading (p) or at the port of entitled to set off the price of the goods which he had bought on the shipowner's account).

(c) But the shipowner may, in effect, recover freight by exercising his lien as unpaid seller for the balance of the unpaid price which has been allocated as between himself and the buyer as freight (Swan v. Barber (1879), 5 Ex. D. 130, C. A.).

discharge (q), as the case may be, are taken as the basis of calculation, whether or not they have increased or diminished during the voyage. Where different methods of weighing or measuring prevail at the ports of loading and discharge, freight is calculated upon the method followed at the port of loading (r), unless, by the custom of a particular trade (s), or by special contract (t), some other method is to be adopted.

Expense of measuring.

In the absence of any express agreement (a) or custom (b) to the contrary, the expense of any weighing or measuring which may be necessary for the purpose of calculating the amount of freight payable (c) falls upon the shipowner and not upon the consignee (d).

Lump freight.

425. If the contract provides for the payment of a lump sum as freight (e), the shipowner need not deliver the whole of the goods contracted to be carried in order to entitle him to his freight. The delivery of any portion of the goods entitles him to the full freight payable under the contract, since he earns it by delivering that which is to be delivered, not that which was originally shipped (f). It is, therefore, immaterial whether his failure to deliver the balance is due to the fact that owing to the fault of the shipowner it was never taken on board (g), or that it was lost by perils of the sea (h), or even that it was lost by circumstances for which the shipowner is responsible (i). Where, however, the goods are shipped and no portion of them is delivered at their destination, no freight is payable (k). If, on the other hand, the charterer fails to put any goods on board, he must nevertheless pay the lump freight, provided that the ship has been duly placed at his disposal (l).

Primage.

426. In addition to the freight, the bill of lading may provide for the payment of primage and average accustomed. Primage is, strictly speaking, payable to the master as his remuneration for looking after the cargo (m), and may therefore be recovered by him from the consignee (n). A contract between the shipowner and the consignor, by which no primage is payable, binds the master if brought to his knowledge (o). In practice, the master agrees with the shipowner to forgo primage in return for a regular salary (p), and in this case any primage which may have been reserved belongs to the shipowner (q).

Average.

The term "average" includes certain charges which are to be borne partly by the ship and partly by the cargo, such as, for instance, the expense of towing or beaconage (r).

SUB-SECT. 5.—Advance Freight.

When payable.

427. Since freight is in the ordinary course payable only on delivery (s) it is a not infrequent practice for the shipowner to stipulate for the payment of at least a portion of the freight in advance (t). Advance freight is usually made payable on the signing

Sometimes the charterparty provides for the payment of a gratuity to the master "on good delivery of the cargo": this gratuity is also payable by the consignee (Howitt v. Paul, Sword & Co. (1877), 5 R. of the bills of lading (a), or at the expiration of a given number of days after sailing (b). The right of the shipowner to advance freight is not affected by the loss of the goods during the voyage and their consequent failure to reach their destination (c). He is therefore entitled to retain any advance freight which may already have been paid (d); or, if it has already become due in the ordinary course of business (e), but has not been paid at the time of the loss, he may recover it from the consignor (f). Where, however, the goods are lost before the advance freight has become due he cannot claim it (g). Nor can he claim it if, though the goods have been put on board, the voyage is abandoned before it has been begun; and it is immaterial that the abandonment of the voyage is attributable to the consignor's failure to pay the advance freight (h). On the other hand, the shipowner's failure to fulfil the stipulations of the charterparty does not preclude him from claiming advance freight if the goods are put on board and the voyage proceeded with (i).

Effect on balance of freight.

428. In calculating the balance of the freight to be paid on the completion of the voyage, the advance freight already paid must be taken into account (k). If, therefore, a portion of the goods is lost on the voyage, the advance freight is not to be treated as apportionable over the whole, including that portion which is lost, but as a payment on account of such freight as, in the circumstances, is shown to have been in fact earned (l).

What constitutes advance freight.

429. Freight is not payable in advance unless the intention of the parties is clear. A mere stipulation that the freight is to be paid at the port of loading and not at the port of discharge is not sufficient (m). Where, however, the consignor is given an option between paying freight at a lower rate at the port of loading and paying it at a higher rate at the port of discharge, it may be inferred, if he elects to pay freight at the lower rate, that such freight was to be paid in advance, and is therefore payable notwithstanding the loss of the goods on the voyage (n). Nor are advances in cash made to the master at the port of loading for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the ship (o) necessarily to be regarded as payments made in advance on account of freight. They may be nothing more than loans, having no reference to the freight, in which case they are repayable by the shipowner whether the goods arrive or not (p). The contract may, however, expressly provide that such advances are to be treated as part of the freight (q), or it may indicate that such is the intention of the parties (r). Thus, the existence of a stipulation providing for the insurance (s) of the advances by the consignor (t) shows that the

Since the master has authority to pledge the shipowner's credit, an express stipulation is unnecessary, and the charterer may recover the amount advanced, though he has not complied with the stipulation (Weston v. Wright (1841), 7 M. & W. 396, where the charterer failed to take bills for the amount drawn by the master on the owner, as provided by the stipulation). But the shipowner is not liable to a person who, at the request of the charterer, advances the requisite amount and takes a bill drawn by the master on the charterer, which is dishonoured (Harder v. Brotherstone (1815), 4 Camp. 254).

(q) De Silvale v. Kendall (1815), 4 M. & S. 37; Byrne v. Schiller (1871), L. R. 6 Exch. 319, Ex. Ch. In this case the shipowner has the option whether he will take the advance or not, and the charterer cannot insist on advancing the whole or any part of the sum named in the charter-party (The Primula, [1894] P. 128).

(r) Abbott on Shipping, 5th ed., p. 276; 14th ed., pp. 664, 665.

(s) As to insurance of advances, see title INSURANCE, Vol. XVII., p. 370. Where advance freight is payable "subject to insurance," the charterer is allowed to deduct the cost of insurance, and thus the shipowner in effect pays for the insurance of the advance freight. He is not, however, under any obligation to insure the advance freight himself on behalf of the charterer (Watson & Co. v. Shankland (1873), L. R. 2 Sc. & Div. 304; advances are a payment on account of freight and not a mere loan (a), since a loan would not be endangered by the perils of the voyage (b).

(t) For note (t) see p. 314, post.

SECT. 6. The Payment of Freight.

In the absence of any reference in the contract, the intention of the parties to treat an advance as made on account of freight may be inferred from their conduct (c).

SUB-SECT. 6.—Pro Ratâ Freight.

Pro ratâ itineris peracti.

430. Where the goods are delivered to the consignee short of the destination prescribed by the contract, the shipowner is not entitled, as a general rule, to be paid freight in proportion to the distance traversed (d). Such freight, which is usually known as freight pro ratâ itineris peracti, or, shortly, as pro ratâ freight, is only payable by virtue of a contract to that effect (e). The question whether such a contract exists usually arises where the ship is unable to complete the voyage, and the goods are accordingly landed short of their destination. No contract to pay pro ratâ freight is to be implied from the mere fact that the consignee has taken delivery (f), or, where the goods have been sold at an inter-

The cause of the shipowner's failure to reach the proper destination is immaterial (Liddard v. Lopes (1809), 10 East, 526; Hopper v. Burness (1876), 1 C. P. It must further be shown that the consignee either expressly contracted to pay it (h), or waived any further performance of the original contract (i), notwithstanding that the shipowner was ready and willing (k) to earn the freight by transhipping and forwarding the goods (l).

SECT. 6. The Payment of Freight.

SECT. 7.—General Average.

SUB-SECT. 1.—Definitions.

431. During the performance of a contract of carriage by sea there are, speaking generally, three separate interests which are exposed to the risks incidental to a maritime adventure—namely, the interest in the ship, the interest in the freight, and the interest in the cargo (m). In the ordinary course, any loss which may be sustained by any of these interests falls upon the particular interest affected, in which case the loss is called a particular average loss (n). Where, however, the loss arises in consequence of extraordinary sacrifices made or expenses incurred for the preservation of the several interests involved, it no longer falls upon the particular interest exclusively, but must be borne in due proportion by all (o). The loss is then called a general average loss (p); the sacrifices or expenses which give rise to it are known as general average sacrifices and general average expenses (q), whilst the amount to be contributed towards the loss by the respective interests is called a general average contribution (r).

(m) As a general rule, all these interests are covered by insurance, and consequently disputes as to liability for general average are, for the most part, between the insurers of the different interests, in which case it is immaterial that the same person is the owner of all three interests (Montgomery & Co. v. Indemnity Mutual Marine Insurance Co., [1902] 1 K. B. 734, C. A., overruling The Brigella, [1893] P. 189). As to general average in connexion with marine policies, generally, see title INSURANCE, Vol. XVII., pp. 447 et seq. The existence of an insurance policy does not, however, affect the liability to general average (Price v. Noble (1811), 4 Taunt. 123).

(r) Marine Insurance Act, 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), s. 66 (3). It has been suggested that the liability to pay a general average contribution is based upon an implied contract (Wright v. Marwood (1881), 7 Q. B. D. 62, C. A., per BRAMWELL, L.J., at p. 67), but the better opinion is that it does not arise out of any contract, but is derived from the Lex Rhodia de jactu (Digest XIV., tit. 2), which has become part of the law maritime, whence it has been incorporated in the law of England (Burton v. English (1883), Requisites.

432. To give rise to a right to claim a general average contribution, the following conditions must be fulfilled, namely:—

Common danger.

(1) The interest claiming contribution and the interest from which contribution is claimed must have been exposed to a common danger (s). There is no case for contribution if the latter interest was never in jeopardy (t), or had been placed in safety before the danger arose (a).

No default.

(2) The danger must not be attributable to the default of the interest claiming contribution (b). If goods are improperly shipped in a dangerous condition, and have to be jettisoned or otherwise destroyed for the purpose of saving the adventure, their owner has no claim for general average contribution, but must bear the loss himself (c). Nor can the shipowner in his turn claim for any loss sustained by the ship, where the danger arose from the unseaworthiness of the ship at starting (d), or from the negligence of the master or crew acting on his behalf (e). If, however, by the terms of the contract of carriage the shipowner is not responsible for the negligence of his servants (f), he may claim, as against parties to the contract, a general average contribution, notwithstanding that the danger which gives rise to the claim was attributable to such negligence (g).

Where the interest claiming contribution is not in default, the cause of the danger is to be disregarded (h).

(3) The danger must be a real danger (i), such as exists where there is certainty of loss within a short time, unless something not to be anticipated should intervene (k). Real danger.

(4) The property in respect of which general average contribution is claimed must have been sacrificed for the benefit of the adventure (l). To constitute a sacrifice, the act must have been voluntarily and reasonably done for the purpose of saving the property (m), and the property dealt with must be safe, except for the common danger (n). There is no sacrifice if the property is forced out of the ship by the violence of the waves, even though the rest of the adventure is thereby saved (o); nor is there a sacrifice where the property in question is, owing to its state or condition, doomed already, and must necessarily perish whether the whole adventure is saved or not (p). Sacrifice.

(5) The property which is called upon to pay general average contribution must have been saved by reason of the sacrifice (q). Property saved.

433. A general average loss of cargo may arise in various ways. Thus, a portion of the cargo may be jettisoned for the purpose of saving the rest of the adventure (r). A jettison of deck cargo, however, does not give rise to general average contribution (s), Examples. General average loss of cargo.

SECT. 7. General Average.

unless the cargo is carried there by virtue of some custom (t) or by agreement of all the parties interested (a). There is equally a general average loss where, in consequence of a fire on board, the cargo is damaged by water being poured upon it to extinguish the fire (b), or through the ship being scuttled with the same object (c); or where, through stress of circumstances, it becomes necessary to burn part of the cargo to enable the engines to keep going (d). The sale of part of the cargo at a port of refuge is a general average sacrifice, if it is necessary for the purpose of completing the voyage, and if it is in the interest of the rest of the cargo that the voyage should be completed (e), but not in any other case (f). Moreover, any depreciation in the value of the cargo caused by putting into a port of refuge to escape a peril is a general average loss (g).

General average loss of freight.

434. There is a general average loss of freight where the shipowner, in taking steps to avert the danger to the whole adventure, so damages a portion of the cargo as to render it unfit to be carried to its destination, and thus sacrifices his opportunity of earning freight upon that portion (h). There is, on the other hand, no general average sacrifice of freight where, owing to the inherent defect of the cargo, the shipowner has been compelled to put into a

Where, however, the ship is chartered under a time charter containing a cesser of hire clause, there is no general average loss of freight, such loss being caused by the operation of the cesser clause (Hudson v. British and Foreign Marine Insurance Co. (1902), 8 Com. Cas. 6).

port of refuge and abandon the attempt to carry it further, so that the freight was already lost (i).

SECT. 7. General Average.

435. The same principle applies to the case of the ship, her tackle, machinery, or other equipment. In this case, however, no question of general average sacrifice arises, where the loss takes place through the use of the ship in the ordinary way (k). However great the peril, it is the duty of the shipowner, in the due performance of the contract, to do everything possible to save both ship and cargo, and for that purpose to make use of all the appliances with which the ship is provided (l). To constitute a general average sacrifice there must be an intentionally abnormal use of the ship (m) or of her equipment (n). Thus, the ship may be run ashore to avoid the danger of a storm or capture (o), or scuttled to extinguish a fire (p); an anchor may be slipped, or a cable may be used in a particular manner out of the usual course for the purpose of protecting the ship (q). A boat may be sacrificed to mislead a pursuing enemy, by being set adrift with a light at its masthead (r). The engines may be strained in the attempt to force a stranded ship off the ground (a); a steam pump, owing to the leaking condition of the ship, may have to be worked constantly, and for this purpose it may become necessary to use spars as fuel (b).

General average loss of ship and equipment.

Where, on the other hand, the loss is occasioned by the ordinary use of the ship or its equipment for the purposes for which they were intended, there is no general average sacrifice, however great the peril may have been, and however great the efforts made to escape it (c); thus, the ship may be damaged in a fight with a privateer (d); she may lose a mast in the attempt to escape through carrying on under full sail when the wind is too strong (e); or she may be compelled to use more coal than was anticipated (f): and the shipowner cannot claim contribution where he himself was in default (g).

436. Expenditure incurred by the shipowner for the benefit of the adventure may also be recovered by him as a general average sacrifice (h). He cannot, however, recover all extraordinary expenses incurred for the purpose of continuing the voyage (i). Thus, the expense of discharging the cargo and placing it into lighters or landing it, is a general average sacrifice (k); but expenses incurred after the removal of the cargo, as, for instance, in connexion with the refloating of the ship, are incurred to save the ship, and are not, as a general rule, for the benefit of the cargo; they must therefore be borne by the shipowner alone (l). There may, however, be cases in which such expenses would fall under general average, as, for instance, where the cargo would be lost unless it is carried on to its destination by the same ship, there being no other means of transport or disposal available (m), or where the discharging of the cargo and refloating of the ship form one continuous operation (n). Similarly, payment made to sailors employed by the shipowner may form the subject of general average if the safety of the whole adventure is involved (o).

Expenses in port of refuge.

437. Where the ship puts into a port of refuge, the question whether expenses incurred there are general average expenses or not necessarily depends upon the circumstances of each case (p). It is not sufficient that the expenses should have been incurred for the common benefit of the ship and cargo (q); they must either themselves fall within the definition of a general average sacrifice (r), or, if not in themselves a general average sacrifice, be nevertheless caused or rendered necessary by one (s). In considering the question it is, therefore, necessary to distinguish the following items, namely:—

Repairs.

(1) The cost of repairing the ship. If the repairs are occasioned by a general average sacrifice, any expenses incurred in repairs fall under general average (t), otherwise they are borne by the shipowner (a).

(2) Port charges and pilotage dues. Since putting into a port of refuge, if justifiable at all (b), is a general average sacrifice (c), all inward port charges and pilotage dues are general average expenses (d), whether the damage which caused the ship to seek the port of refuge is the subject of general average (e) or not (f). On the other hand, the outward port charges and pilotage dues are particular average charges, borne by the freight, since they are incurred for the purpose of earning it (g), unless the original damage was the subject of general average, in which case such charges are treated as general average (h).

(2) Port charges and pilotage dues.

(3) Wages of the crew. The shipowner is entitled to a general average contribution towards the wages of the crew in the port of refuge, provided that the damage which caused the ship to seek the port of refuge is itself the subject of general average (i), but not otherwise (k).

(3) Wages.

(4) The cost of discharging the cargo. If the discharge is necessary for the common preservation of both ship and cargo, it is in itself a general average sacrifice (l); though not necessary for the preservation of the cargo, it may be impossible to repair the ship unless the cargo is discharged, and in this case, if the cost of repairs is the subject of general average, the expenses of discharging are equally the subject of general average (m). In practice, the expenses of discharging the cargo are always treated as the subject of general average (n).

(4) Unloading charges.

(5) The cost of warehousing and reloading the cargo. If the unloading was necessitated by some antecedent act of general average sacrifice, these expenses form the subject of general average, provided that all the dealings with the cargo form part of a continuous operation (o). In any other case the warehouse rent of cargo is charged to cargo (p), whilst the cost of reloading is charged to freight (q).

SUB-SECT. 3.—The Liability to Contribution.

Persons liable.

438. All persons whose interest in the adventure is benefited by a general average sacrifice or by a general average expenditure are liable to make a general average contribution (r). These persons are:—(1) The shipowner (s), who is liable in respect of the ship, and also in respect of the freight (t). (2) The charterer, if any, who is liable in respect of his interest in the bill of lading freight (a); in this case the shipowner's liability as regards the freight is restricted to the chartered freight (b). If the charterparty is by way of demise, the charterer is also liable in respect of the ship (c). (3) The owner of the cargo, who is liable in respect of the cargo (d). (4) Any other person who may be liable under some express term in the contract of carriage. Thus, the bill of lading may preserve the shipper's liability (e), or it may provide for payment of general average contribution by the consignee (f). A consignee is not, as such, liable, even though he has taken delivery of the cargo (g); he may, however, make himself liable as under a new contract, by taking delivery with notice that the cargo is held by the shipowner subject to his lien for general average contribution (h); or he may be liable as owner of the cargo (i).

Enforcement by lien.

439. The liability of any particular interest to make contribution is usually enforced by the shipowner on behalf of all interests concerned (k). He is entitled, as regards the cargo, to exercise a lien over it, and to withhold delivery until any general average contributions due either to himself or to any other persons have been paid (l). Unless the contract otherwise provides, it is his duty to exercise his lien on behalf of such other persons (m); and, if he fails to do so, he is himself liable to them (n). In practice, delivery of the cargo is usually made upon the cargo owner giving security (o) to pay the amount which will be found due upon adjustment (p).

Enforcement by action.

440. The lien is only available to the shipowner, or to the charterer, if the charterparty is by way of demise (q). If they do not rely upon their lien, they may maintain an action against the person liable to contribute (r). Any other person claiming contribution, such as, for instance, the owner of the cargo (s) or the person entitled to the freight (t), must enforce his right by action.

Adjustment.

441. Unless the contract provides otherwise (a), the adjustment of the amount to be contributed by the respective interests is determined by the law of the place where the adjustment is to be made (a), that is to say, at the place where under the contract the voyage is to terminate (b). The adjustment may take place at a port of refuge, if the voyage is abandoned there by agreement or by necessity (c), but not otherwise (d).

Value of cargo.

As regards the cargo, the rules to be applied, both in estimating the value of the cargo sacrificed and in valuing the cargo saved, depend upon the time and place of the adjustment and not upon the time and place of the sacrifice (e). In estimating the value of the cargo sacrificed, it is necessary to take into account the probable state of the cargo on its arrival, if the sacrifice had never taken place: if therefore it would, in all probability, have arrived in an unsound state, the value for the purposes of contribution is its value if it had arrived in an unsound state (f). Similarly, where the cargo is damaged or otherwise depreciated through a general average sacrifice, the difference in value arising from the depreciation is to be allowed (g),

Value of ship.

442. As regards the ship, the amount to be contributed towards the sacrifice made by the shipowner is to be based on the cost of repairing the ship or making good the equipment sacrificed (h). If the ship, in consequence of the sacrifice, becomes a constructive total loss, the adjustment must be based upon the value of the ship just before the sacrifice took place (i). If the ship had at that time already sustained particular average damage, her value at the time of the sacrifice is her value as depreciated by the particular average damage, and this must be calculated by deducting the estimated cost of repairing the particular average damage; a further deduction must be made in respect of the proceeds of the sale of the ship, and the balance is the amount of the general average loss (k).

If it is the shipowner who has to make contribution, his liability is based on the value of the ship at the time when she arrives at her destination or other place of adjustment (l).

Value of freight.

443. As regards the freight, the contribution payable by the person entitled to it is based on the amount of freight at risk (m), less the expenses of earning it, which would have been saved if the ship had been lost (n). Where freight has been sacrificed, the amount to be made good is the gross freight lost, after deducting the charges which the shipowner would have incurred to earn it, but which he has, in consequence of the sacrifice, not incurred (o).

Average statement.

444. The shipowner is not bound to employ a professional average adjuster, and any average statement prepared by such adjuster does not in the absence of express contract bind the various persons interested (p). The shipowner must, however, present the average statement within a reasonable time (q). It is his duty at the same time to place before the average adjuster all necessary particulars and accounts (r).

SECT. 8.—The Shipowner as a Common Carrier.

445. Every shipowner who carries goods for hire in his ship, whether by inland navigation (s), or coastwise (a), or abroad (b), undertakes to carry them at his own absolute risk, the act of God (c) or of the King's enemies (d), or the inherent defect of the goods themselves (e), or the shipper's default (f) alone excepted, unless by agreement between himself and a particular shipper on a particular voyage or on particular voyages he limits his liability by further exceptions (g). He therefore incurs the liability of a common carrier (h) in respect of the goods which he carries (i). In considering the extent of his liability, it thus becomes unnecessary to inquire whether he is a common carrier or not (k), or whether the ship is employed in carrying the goods of all comers as a general ship (l), or in carrying the goods of a particular person only under a charterparty or similar contract (m).

(k) There does not appear to be any direct authority on the point. Rep. 85 (where the special verdict was in general terms), Coggs v. Bernard (1703), 2 Ld. When Nugent v. Smith, supra, went to the Court of Appeal, COCKBURN, C.J., at pp. 434 et seq., expressly dissented from the view taken by BRETT, J., and doubted the correctness of the opinion expressed by BLACKBURN, J., in Liver Alkali Co. v. Johnson, supra; in his view a shipowner who is not a common carrier is an ordinary bailee, bound to use reasonable care, and exempt from liability where the loss could not have been avoided by reasonable care, skill and diligence. There are various dicta which may appear to support this view; see Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co. (1866), L. R. 1 C. P. 600, per WILLES, J., at p. 612, citing Laurie v. Douglas (1846), 15 M. & W. 746; Notara v. Henderson (1872), L. R. 7 Q. B. 225, Ex. Ch., per WILLES, J., at p. 236; Wilson, Sons & Co. v. The "Xantho" (Owners of Cargo) (1887), 12 App. Cas. 503, per Lord HERSCHELL, at p. 510; Hamilton, Fraser & Co. v. Pandorf & Co. (1887), 12 App. Cas. 518, per Lord WATSON, at p. 526. But it will be found on looking at the cases that this point was not clearly present to the minds of the respective judges, so as to make it certain that they were expressing an opinion contrary to that held by BRETT, J.; and the language used, as, for instance, in Notara v. Henderson, supra, at p. 237, is not inconsistent with it. It may be noted that, though the use of exceptions in a bill of lading may be defended on the grounds that the bill of lading is a document in common form, and that the ship may at any time be employed as a general ship, in which case the shipowner is liable as a common carrier, and therefore needs protection, a contract by charterparty stands in a different position. The shipowner who charters his ship is not necessarily a common carrier making a special contract of carriage; if, therefore, he is not liable as insurer, but only for negligence, it is unnecessary to insert in his charterparty any exceptions other than negligence. Consequently, if he is not guilty of negligence, it is immaterial to inquire whether, in the case of the cargo being lost or damaged, any particular exception applies or not, since, even in the absence of negligence, he would not be liable. Yet, in the various cases upon the application of exceptions, it appears to be assumed that, if no exception applies, the shipowner is liable (compare Burton v. English (1883), 12 Q. B. D. 218, C. A., where BRETT, M.R., at p. 219, points out that the ship was not a general ship, and where BOWEN, L.J., at p. 223, speaks of the shipowner as a carrier; Kish v. Taylor, [1912] A. C. 604, per Lord ATKINSON, at p. 617), and except by COCKBURN, C.J., in Nugent v. Smith, supra, it has not been suggested that he would not be liable unless he was a common carrier.

Part VIII.—Carriage of Passengers.

SECT. 1. The Contract of Carriage.

Position of shipowner.

446. The conveyance of passengers on merchant ships is, for the purposes of safety and the like, the subject of numerous statutory regulations, which are dealt with hereafter (n). Apart from these, the position of an owner who carries passengers on his ship, or of a charterer who has control of the ship and is entitled to carry passengers (o), depends mainly upon the terms of the contract between him and the individual passenger. He is not obliged to carry passengers at all, but if he holds himself out as a carrier of passengers he is probably bound to receive and carry all who are willing to contract with him, provided there is room on the ship and that the prospective passenger is a fit person to be carried, and not one whose presence would be likely to injuriously affect or endanger the ship, the owner, the crew, or the other passengers (p). The mere fact that the presence of a particular passenger might offend the susceptibilities of others does not justify a refusal to carry (q), and a person of notoriously bad character, who has been accepted as a passenger, is entitled to be carried so long as he behaves himself properly (r).

Shipowner's liability.

447. A shipowner is not an insurer of the safety of the passengers carried on his ship (s). His responsibility is limited by the terms of the contract of carriage and by his implied undertaking to take all due care (t), including the exercise of reasonable skill and foresight by him and his servants, to carry the passenger in safety. This undertaking involves a duty to provide a ship as fit and seaworthy as care and skill can render it (a), but there is no implied warranty that the ship is free from all defects likely to cause peril (b). The owner, and the master as his agent, must also make reasonable provision for the food, comfort and accommodation of the passengers, and provide reasonable facilities for the carriage of their luggage (c).

The shipowner's liability to a passenger for injuries sustained by reason of the negligence of the owner, or of his servants while acting within the scope of their employment, extends to a passenger in another ship who may be injured by reason of such negligence, even though the master and crew of the other ship had been guilty of contributory negligence (d). A passenger is not identified in respect of negligence with those navigating the ship on which he is carried (e).

Limiting liability.

448. A shipowner may, by inserting conditions in the contract, relieve himself, either in whole or in part, from liability for damage, loss, or injury to the passenger or his luggage (f), but he must cause the conditions to be brought to the notice of the passenger (g). In the absence of a special contract, the owner's liability for injury to the passenger is based upon negligence (h), and his liability as to the passenger's luggage is the same as that of other carriers (i), though in all cases where the injury or loss occurs without his actual fault or privity the statutory limitations hereafter mentioned may apply (k).

Commencement of voyage and delay.

449. Apart from any warranty (l), a passenger has no right to insist that the ship shall begin the voyage at the advertised or agreed time. It is sufficient if the voyage is begun within a reasonable time (m), but the shipowner must use due care to avoid delay in the prosecution of the voyage, and, if he fails in this, he may be liable to an inconvenienced passenger for such damages as are the reasonable consequence of his default, unless he has contracted to be liable to a greater or less extent (n).

Passage money.

450. If the contract is silent as to the time for payment of the passage money, it must be paid at the accustomed time, if there is any usage in this respect; and it seems that if the money is paid in advance, and the ship is lost before the commencement of the voyage, the money must be returned (o). For unpaid passage money the master has a lien on the passenger's luggage, but not on his person nor on the clothes he is wearing (p).

Conflict of laws.

451. A contract for the carriage of passengers is primâ facie governed by the law of the country where it is made (q), but the parties may agree that the law of the country of the ship's flag shall be applicable (r).

Authority of master over passengers.

452. At common law the master of a vessel has absolute control over the passengers, and they are bound to obey all his reasonable orders, and in emergency even to work the ship or to fight it (a). The master may use reasonable means to enforce obedience to his lawful commands, and may, when necessary, remove or even imprison a disobedient passenger, but his power is limited to the necessity of the case, and, if he uses excessive means to enforce obedience, or attempts to enforce obedience in such a manner as to exceed his authority, he is liable to an action for damages (b).

Power of detention.

The master of a passenger steamer may detain without warrant, and convey before a justice of the peace, any drunk and disorderly person who persists in entering the ship after he has been refused admission and his fare has been returned or tendered, or who, in the United Kingdom, refuses to leave the ship when requested; any person who, after being warned, molests any passenger; any person who persists in attempting to enter a steamer which is full; or who attempts to travel without first paying his fare (c); or who knowingly and wilfully travels beyond the distance for which he has paid his fare, in either case with intent to avoid payment; or who refuses and neglects to quit the steamer on arrival at the point to which he has paid his fare; or who fails to pay his fare or exhibit his ticket when requested (d); or who wilfully causes obstruction or injury to any part of the machinery or tackle, or obstructs or impedes or molests the crew, or any of them, in the execution of their duty (e). The power of detention only arises, however, where the name and address of the offender are unknown to the master or his officer (f).

(n) See title DAMAGES, Vol. X., pp. 311, 312. If by reason of the unpunctual arrival of the ship a passenger misses his train, he cannot recover the cost of a special train, unless he can show that the expense is one which he would have incurred if he had missed the train by his own fault (Bright v. Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. (1897), 2 Com. Cas. 106).

The master of a home-trade passenger steamer may refuse to receive on board any person who is in such a state, or misconducts himself in such a manner, as to annoy or injure passengers on board, and may put any such person ashore at any convenient place (g).

Sanitary regulations.

In every emigrant ship the medical practitioner, aided by the master, or in the absence of the medical practitioner the master alone, is bound to exact obedience to all sanitary regulations made by Order in Council (h).

Sale of spirits.

In any emigrant ship spirits may not, during the voyage, be sold directly or indirectly to any steerage passenger (i).

(g) Ibid., s. 288. "Home-trade passenger ship" means a ship employed in carrying passengers within the following limits:—the United Kingdom, the Channel Islands and Isle of Man, and the continent of Europe between the river Elbe and Brest inclusive (ibid., s. 742).

(h) Ibid., s. 325 (1). Regulations may be made by Order in Council (1) for preserving order, promoting health and securing cleanliness and ventilation on board emigrant ships proceeding from the British Islands to any port in a British possession; (2) for prohibiting emigration from any port at any time when choleraic or any epidemic disease is generally prevalent in the British Islands or any part thereof; (3) for reducing the number of steerage passengers allowed to be carried either generally or from any particular ports in the British Islands; (4) for permitting the use on board emigrant ships of apparatus for distilling water and for defining in such case the quantity of fresh water to be carried in tanks and casks for the steerage passengers under the earlier provisions of the M. S. Act, 1894, Part III.; and (5) for requiring duly authorised medical practitioners to be carried in emigrant ships where they would not otherwise be required under ibid., Part III., to be carried (ibid., s. 324). An Order in Council approving regulations as to distilling apparatus and quantity of water to be carried on emigrant ships, dated the 25th January, 1908, is in force (Stat. R. & O., 1908, p. 639). If any person on board fails without reasonable cause to obey or offends against any such regulation or any provision of the M. S. Act, 1894, Part III., or obstructs the master or medical practitioner in the execution of any duty imposed upon him by any such regulation, or is guilty of riotous or insubordinate conduct, that person is liable for each offence to a fine not exceeding £2, and, in addition, to imprisonment for any period not exceeding one month (ibid., s. 325 (2)); see also title PUBLIC HEALTH AND LOCAL ADMINISTRATION, Vol. XXIII., pp. 464 et seq. As to emigrant ships, see, further, pp. 335 et seq., post.

(i) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 326 (1). By ibid., s. 326 (2), any person contravening this provision is liable to a fine not exceeding £20.

SECT. 2.—Statutory Requirements.

SECT. 2. Statutory Requirements.

SUB-SECT. 1.—Definitions (a).

453. A "passenger" is any person carried in a ship (b) other than the master and crew and the owner, his family and servants (c). Passenger.

A "passenger steamer" includes every steamship (d), whether British or foreign, carrying passengers to, from or between any places in the United Kingdom, except steam ferry boats working in chains (e). Passenger steamer.

An "emigrant ship" means every sea-going (f) vessel, whether British or foreign, and whether or not conveying mails, which carries, on any voyage to which the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, Part III., applies (g), more than fifty steerage passengers or a greater number of steerage passengers than, if it be a sailing ship, one statute adult to thirty-three tons, or, if a steamship, one statute adult to twenty tons of the ship's registered tonnage. The definition includes a ship which coming from outside the British Islands takes on board at any port therein such number of steerage passengers, whether British subjects or resident aliens, as would, with or without the steerage passengers already on board, constitute her an emigrant ship (h). Emigrant ships.

A "statute adult" is a person aged twelve years or upwards or two persons between the ages of one and twelve years (i). Statute adult.

(a) The definitions here given are definitions for the purposes of the M. S. Act, 1894, Part III. (ibid., s. 267; The Clymene, [1897] P. 295, 300).

(b) A ship includes every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 742). A vessel which would otherwise be a ship is not excluded merely because she is propelled by oars (Ex parte Ferguson (1871), L. R. 6 Q. B. 280, 290). A hopper barge without motive power may be a ship (The Mac (1882), L. R. 7 P. D. 126, C. A.). As to whether an unfinished vessel is a ship, see Re Softley, Ex parte Hodgkin (1875), L. R. 20 Eq. 746. See also p. 14, ante.

As to alien passengers, see Aliens Act, 1905 (5 Edw. 7. c. 13); title ALIENS, Vol. I., pp. 320 et seq.

(d) This includes vessels propelled by electricity or other mechanical power (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 743). But such vessels to be ships must be used in navigation (Southport Corporation v. Morriss, [1893] 1 Q. B. 359). A motor boat which plies for hire may be a "passenger steamer" (Weeks v. Ross, [1913] 2 K. B. 229).

Act, 1894, ss. 364—368). (h) Ibid., s. 268 (1).

Steerage passenger. Cabin passenger.

A "steerage passenger" is any passenger not a "cabin passenger," and persons are deemed to be cabin passengers when the space allotted to their exclusive use is in the proportion of at least thirty-six superficial feet to each statute adult and their fare is at least £25 for the whole voyage, or is in the proportion of at least 65*s.* for every thousand miles (k), and they have been furnished with a duly signed contract ticket in the form prescribed by the Board of Trade for cabin passengers (l).

Steerage passage.

"Steerage passage" includes passage of all passengers but cabin passengers (m).

Upper passenger deck.

"Upper passenger deck" means and includes the deck immediately beneath the upper deck, or the poop or round-house and deck-house when the number of passengers, whether cabin or steerage passengers, carried in the poop, round-house, or deck-house exceeds one-third of the total number of steerage passengers which the ship may lawfully carry on the deck next below (n).

Lower passenger deck.

"Lower passenger deck" means and includes the deck next beneath the upper passenger deck, not being an orlop deck (o).

Colonial voyage.

A "colonial voyage" means a voyage from any port in a British possession other than British India (p) or Hong Kong to any port whatever, where the distance between such ports exceeds four hundred miles or the duration of the voyage, as determined under the Merchant Shipping Act (q), 1894, Part III., exceeds three days (r).

SUB-SECT. 2.—Surveys of Ships.

Annual survey.

454. The owner of every passenger steamer (s) must cause her to be surveyed at least once a year by a ship surveyor and an

(k) By Board of Trade Notice dated the 23rd September, 1907, a voyage from the British Islands to the East Coast of North America is for this purpose three thousand miles, and to South Africa six thousand miles.

The failure to give such a ticket does not seem to make a person, who is otherwise a cabin passenger, a steerage passenger for the purposes of the definition of "emigrant ship" (Ellis v. Pearce (1858), E. B. & E. 431).

(s) Ibid., s. 272. If the provisions as to survey and as to a certificate (as to which see pp. 333, 334, post) are not complied with, the master or owner is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £10 for every passenger carried, and the master or owner of any tender is liable to a like penalty for every passenger taken on board (M. S. Act, 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 48), s. 21); as to exemptions for certain foreign steamers, see M. S. Act, 1894, s. 363, and quære whether the effect of ibid., s. 271, does not cut down the obligation for survey to passenger steamers carrying more than twelve passengers.

engineer surveyor (t), the former being, in the case of iron steamers, qualified in the opinion of the Board of Trade to survey iron steamers. Such surveyors, if satisfied by the survey that they can properly do so, must deliver to the owner declarations of survey, in a form approved by the Board of Trade (a), which the owner must within fourteen days of their receipt transmit to the Board of Trade (b). If the owner of a steamer feels aggrieved by a declaration of survey, or by the refusal to give a declaration, he may appeal to the court of survey of the port or district where the steamer then is, and the judge of that court must report to the Board of Trade on the question raised by the appeal (c). But no such appeal lies where the owner has exercised his right of appointing some other person to accompany the surveyor or surveyors and that person agrees in the result (d).

Passenger steamer's certificate.

455. The Board of Trade, on the receipt of the declarations of survey, if satisfied that the statutory requirements have been complied with, must, and on the report of a court of survey, if satisfied that the requirements of the report as well as of the statute have been complied with, may, issue in duplicate a passenger steamer's certificate (e). The Board must transmit this certificate to a superintendent or other public officer at the port selected by the owner, or where the owner or agent resides, or the steamer has been surveyed or is lying, and must give notice of the transmission to the master or owner or his agent, and the officer to whom the certificate was transmitted must deliver both copies to the master, owner, or agent on their application and payment of the proper fee. It is sufficient proof of the issue of a certificate to show its receipt by the officer and notice of transmission to the owner, master, or agent (f). A certificate is in force for a year from the date of issue or any less time specified in it, unless the Board of Trade gives notice that it has cancelled it (g). The Board may cancel a certificate if it has reason to believe that there was any fraud

(t) The survey may be made by the same person if he has been appointed both as ship and engineer surveyor (M. S. Act, 1906, s. 75 (3)); as to the appointment of surveyors, see M. S. Acts, 1894, s. 724; 1906, s. 75.

(b) Ibid., s. 273 (1). On failure to do so without reasonable cause, the owner becomes liable to forfeit not exceeding 10*s.* for each day of delay (ibid., s. 273 (2), which makes the sum forfeited payable on the grant of the certificate of survey in addition to the fee).

(c) Ibid., s. 275. This provision for appeal was held to oust the jurisdiction of the Court of Session, at least until after appeal (Denny and Brothers v. Board of Trade (1880), 7 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 1019). As to courts of survey and their procedure, see ibid., ss. 487—489; title COURTS, Vol. IX., p. 107; p. 662, post.

SECT. 2. Statutory Requirements.

or error in any declaration upon which the certificate was founded, or that it was issued upon false or erroneous information, or that, since the declaration was made, the hull, equipments or machinery have been injured, or are otherwise insufficient (h). When a certificate has expired or been cancelled the Board may require its delivery up (i).

Exhibiting certificate.

456. The master or owner of every steamer required to have a certificate (k) must, on its receipt by him or his agent, have one of the copies at once posted up on board in a conspicuous place so as to be legible to all persons on board, and must have it kept so posted up and legible while it remains in force and the steamer is in use. Failure without reasonable cause to comply with this regulation renders the owner or master liable to a fine of not exceeding £10 for each offence; and if the steamer plies or goes to sea with passengers on board and the regulation is not complied with, the owner is liable to a fine not exceeding £100 and the master to a further fine not exceeding £20 (l).

Plying without certificate.

457. Unless the owner or master of a passenger steamer which carries more than twelve passengers has obtained a passenger steamer's certificate, the steamer may not ply or proceed to sea or on any voyage or excursion with any passengers on board, and if it should attempt to do so it may be detained until the certificate is produced to the proper officer of Customs (m); and the master or owner is also liable on a breach of this provision to a fine on summary conviction (n). But when a passenger steamer is abroad when her certificate expires, no fine for want of a certificate is incurred until she first begins to ply with passengers after her next return to the United Kingdom (o).

It is an offence for an owner or master of a passenger steamer to receive on board, or on any part of her, a number of passengers greater than the certificate allows (p).

It is a misdemeanour (q) knowingly and wilfully to make or assist in making a false declaration of survey or passenger steamer's certificate, or to forge or fraudulently to alter any such declaration or certificate.

(h) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 279 (1). In every such case the Board may require the owner to have a fresh survey of the hull, equipments or machinery, and to transmit fresh declarations of survey before reissuing the certificate or granting a fresh one (ibid., s. 279 (2)).

(i) An owner or master who fails without reasonable cause to comply is liable to a fine not exceeding £10 (ibid., s. 280).

(k) I.e., a passenger steamer which carries more than twelve passengers, and which plies or proceeds to sea on any voyage or excursion with passengers on board, not being an emigrant ship, which has complied with the rules for survey of emigrant ships (ibid., s. 271).

(o) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 278 (2).

(p) The penalty is a fine not exceeding £20 for each offence, and in addition, a fine for every passenger above the number allowed (ibid., s. 283). Where a passenger steamer has such an excess of passengers on board at any place, the master or owner is deemed to have received them on board at such place (M. S. Act, 1906, s. 22).

(q) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 282. For punishment, see ibid., s. 680.

458. Where the Board of Trade is satisfied that the laws of a British possession provide for the grant of passenger steamers' certificates similar to those in the United Kingdom and after similar surveys, an Order in Council may declare that such certificates have the same force as those granted in the United Kingdom, and are subject, with or without modification, to the foregoing provisions, and may impose conditions or regulations with regard to the certificates, their use, delivery, and cancellation, and impose fines not exceeding £50 for breach of such conditions and regulations (r).

(ii.) Emigrant Ships.

Survey of emigrant ship.

459. An emigrant ship (s) which has no passenger steamer's certificate in force (t) must be surveyed at the expense of her owner or charterer, under the direction of the emigration officer (a), at the port of clearance, by at least two competent surveyors, and must be reported by them seaworthy and fit for the intended voyage before clearing outwards or proceeding to sea on a voyage (b).

The survey must be made before any cargo is loaded, except such as may be necessary for ballast, and that portion, if any, must be shifted at the request of the emigration officer or the surveyors so as to expose successively each part of the frame of the vessel (c).

Adverse report.

In case of an adverse report the owner or charterer may require the emigration officer to appoint three other competent surveyors, two at least being shipwrights, to survey at the expense of the owner or charterer. The officer must then appoint, and if these surveyors report unanimously that the ship is seaworthy and fit for her voyage, she may clear and proceed (d).

(r) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 284. The orders in force are:—Bengal, 17th October, 1884; Bombay, 26th June, 1884; New South Wales, 23rd November, 1893; New Zealand, 26th November, 1886; Queensland, 8th March, 1895; South Australia, 14th February, 1883; Tasmania, 21st November, 1895; Victoria, 8th March, 1895 (all in Stat. R. & O. Rev., Vol. VIII., Merchant Shipping, pp. 122—131); and Mauritius, 27th February, 1905 (Stat. R. & O., 1905, p. 208). The convention of the 20th January, 1914 (see note (p), p. 78, ante), provides for mutual recognition of certificates by the countries concerned.

(a) As to these officers, see ibid., s. 355. As to the fees payable for survey, see ibid., s. 360 (2). As to the equipment required, see ibid., s. 290. Any person employed under ibid., Part III., who demands or receives, directly or indirectly, otherwise than by direction of the Board of Trade, any fee, remuneration, or gratuity whatever in respect of any duty performed by him under ibid., Part III., is liable for each offence to a fine not exceeding £50 (ibid., s. 360 (3)).

(b) For the voyages to which this applies, see ibid., ss. 364, 365; as to the exemption from survey of certain foreign vessels, ibid., s. 363; as to the application of survey rules to British possessions, ibid., s. 366 (3). SECT. 2. SUB-SECT. 3.—Equipment of Ships.

Statutory Requirements.

460. In addition to the requirements stated elsewhere (e) as to compasses, and fire-extinguishing and life-saving appliances, a home-trade passenger steamer (f) must have such shelter for her deck passengers as the Board of Trade requires, and every passenger steamer must have a safety-valve to each boiler, so constructed as to be out of the control of the engineer when the steam is up, and, if this valve is in addition to the ordinary valve, so constructed as to have an area not less and a pressure not greater than the area of and pressure on the ordinary valve (g). Emigrant ships must be supplied with sufficient anchors and chains (h).

Deck shelter.

Safety valve.

Signals.

461. Every sea-going passenger ship must also be provided, to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade, with means for making signals of distress and with a proper supply of lights inextinguishable in water and attachable to lifebuoys (i).

Every ship must also be provided with lights and the means of making fog signals in conformity with the collision regulations (j), and the provisions as to inspection, notices and detention with regard to life-saving appliances apply (k). But in the case of lights and fog signals appeal may be made on the refusal of a certificate to the court of survey (l) in the port or district where the ship for the time being is, and the judge of the court is to report to the Board of Trade, who may, if satisfied that the requirements of the report and of the statute as to lights and fog signals have been complied with, grant or direct the grant of the certificate (m). No appeal lies if the owner has appointed some person to accompany the surveyor on his inspection, and that person and the surveyor agreed (n).

SUB-SECT. 4.—Passenger's Contract.

Contract tickets.

462. Any person, except the Board of Trade and persons acting for it and under its direct authority, who receives money from any person, for or in respect of a passage as a steerage passenger in any ship (o), or as a cabin passenger in any emigrant ship proceeding from the British Islands to any port outside of Europe and not within the Mediterranean Sea, is to give to the person paying the same a contract ticket, signed by or on behalf of the owner, charterer, or master of the ship, and printed in plain and legible characters (a). The ticket is to be in a form approved by the Board of Trade and published in the London Gazette, and any directions contained in the ticket, not being inconsistent with the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, are to be obeyed as if set forth in the Act (b). Such a ticket is not liable to stamp duty (c).

Any question arising as to breach or non-performance of any stipulation in such ticket may at the option of the passenger interested, whether cabin or steerage, be tried before a court of summary jurisdiction (d).

Production of ticket.

463. It is an offence for any passenger, either cabin or steerage, to fail without reasonable cause to produce, on demand of any emigration officer, his contract ticket, or for any owner, charterer, or master of a ship on like demand to fail without reasonable cause to produce, for the inspection of such officer and for the purposes of the Act, the counterpart of any contract ticket issued by him or on his behalf (e). Any person who, after the issue of a contract ticket and during the continuance of the contract of which that ticket is evidence, alters it or induces any person to part with it or renders it useless or destroys it, is liable, except in the case of the contract ticket of a cabin passenger who consents, to a fine (f).

SUB-SECT. 5.—Number of and Accommodation for Passengers.

L. R. 629). The penalty for failure to comply with this provision is, for each offence, not exceeding £50 (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 320 (3)).

SECT. 2. Statutory Requirements.

greater number is on board such a ship, except as increased by births at sea, the master is liable to a fine (h).

The regulations of the Board of Trade as to the accommodation for steerage passengers, relating to the construction of passenger decks, to berths, to hospitals, to privies, and to the supply of light and ventilation are to be observed, and if any requirement in such regulations is not complied with in the case of an emigrant ship, the owner, charterer, or master, or any of them, is liable (i). No part of the cargo, or of the steerage passengers' luggage, or of the provisions, water, or stores, whether for the use of the steerage passengers or of the crew, is to be carried on the upper deck or on the passenger decks, unless in the opinion of the emigration officer at the port of clearance the same is so placed as not to impede light or ventilation, or to interfere with the comfort of the steerage passengers, nor unless the same is stowed and secured to the satisfaction of the emigration officer; and the space thereby occupied or rendered in the opinion of such officer unavailable for the accommodation of steerage passengers must, unless occupied by their luggage, be deducted in calculating the space by which the number of steerage passengers is regulated (k).

SUB-SECT. 6.—Provisions, Water, and Stores.

Provisions and water.

465. Every emigrant ship is to have on board for the steerage passengers provisions and water of good and wholesome quality, and in sweet and good condition, sufficient to secure the prescribed ration issues (l). Besides the pure water for each steerage passenger, water must be shipped for cooking purposes sufficient to supply ten gallons for every day of the length of the voyage for every hundred statute adults on board (m). There must also be shipped for the use of the crew and all other persons on board an ample amount of

(h) The fine is not to exceed £20 for each steerage passenger constituting such excess (M. S. Acts, 1894, s. 292; 1906, s. 17). By M. S. Act, 1894, s. 337, the same limit is placed on the number of steerage passengers on board of a ship bringing such passengers to the British Islands from any port out of Europe and not within the Mediterranean Sea, and in case of excess the master is liable to a fine not exceeding £10 for each statute adult (see p. 331, ante) constituting such excess.

(i) M. S. Acts, 1894, s. 293; 1906, s. 17. The penalty is £50. The master alone is liable to the fine where, in any such regulation, he is expressed to be alone liable (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 293 (2)). For the regulations, see Stat. R. & O., 1907, p. 674. They do not apply to ships carrying steerage passengers on a colonial voyage (see p. 322, ante) of less than three weeks' duration (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 365 (2)).

(k) Ibid., s. 294 (1). If any requirement of ibid., s. 294, is not complied with in the case of any emigrant ship, the owner, charterer, or master, or any of them, is liable for each offence to a fine not exceeding £300 (ibid., s. 294 (2)).

(l) Ibid., s. 295 (1). For the issues required, see the Scale and Regulations of the 2nd January, 1908, prescribed by the Board of Trade under the M. S. Act, 1906, s. 17 (Stat. R. & O., 1908, p. 636). As to distilled water, see the M. S. Act, 1894, s. 324 (iv.): note (q), p. 339, post.

(m) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 295 (2). The length of voyage is to be determined under ibid., s. 269, by scales fixed by the Board of Trade. The scale now in force is contained in the Notice of the 23rd September, 1907 (Stat. R. & O., 1908, p. 635). As to statute adults, see p. 331, ante.

wholesome provisions and pure water, not inferior in quality to those provided for the steerage passengers (n). All the water and provisions mentioned are to be stowed away at the expense of the owner, charterer, or master (o).

Before clearance of an emigrant ship, a survey of the water and provisions required for the steerage passengers must be held by the emigration officer at the port of clearance, or by some competent surveyor appointed by him, and the officer must be satisfied that they conform to the requirements in quality, condition, and amount. If he considers that any part of the provisions or water fails in quality or condition he may reject and mark that part, or the packages or vessels containing it, and direct it to be landed or emptied (p).

The water to be placed on board emigrant ships is to be carried in tanks or casks approved by the emigration officer at the port of clearance; the casks are not to be of greater capacity than 300 gallons, and are to be sweet and tight, and of sufficient strength, and, if made of wood, properly charred inside, and the staves are not to be of fir, pine, or soft wood (q).

If an emigrant ship is intended to call at any intermediate port during the voyage to take in water, and an engagement to that effect is inserted in the master's bond (r), it is sufficient, subject to certain conditions, to ship at the port of clearance such a supply of water as the Act requires for the voyage to the intermediate port (s).

Issue of rations.

(n) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 295 (3).

(o) Ibid., s. 295 (4). If an emigrant ship obtains a clearance without having the requisite quantities of water and provisions, the owner, charterer, or master, or any of them, is liable to a fine for each offence not exceeding £300 (ibid., s. 295 (5)).

(p) Ibid., s. 295 (6), (7). If this is not done, or if what is landed, or any part of it, is reshipped on the same ship, the owner, charterer, or master of the ship, or any of them, is liable to a fine for each offence not exceeding £100; the same penalty is incurred if it is shipped on any other emigrant ship by the person causing it to be so shipped (ibid., s. 295 (8)).

(q) Ibid., s. 296, which provides that on non-compliance the owner, charterer, or master is liable to a fine for each offence not exceeding £50. By ibid., s. 324 (iv.), regulations may be made by Order in Council permitting distilling apparatus to be used on emigrant ships, and defining in such case the amount of fresh water to be carried in tanks and casks for steerage passengers. The order now in force is dated 25th January, 1908 (Stat. R. & O., 1908, p. 639).

(r) See as to this, pp. 343, 344, post.

(s) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 297. The conditions are: (1) that the emigration officer at the port of clearance approves in writing of the arrangement, that the approval is carried among the ship's papers exhibited at the intermediate port and delivered on the arrival of the ship at her final port of discharge to the chief officer of customs or British consular officer; (2) that if the length of either portion of the voyage is not determined under ibid., Part III., it is declared by writing by the emigration officer at the port of clearance as part of his approval of the arrangement; (3) that the ship at the time of clearance has such tanks and water casks of the required description as are required for the longest of the aforesaid portions of the voyage (ibid., s. 297).

SECT. 2. Statutory Requirements.

to issue to each steerage passenger, or, where the steerage passengers are divided into messes, to the head man for the time being of each mess on behalf and for the use of all its members, an allowance of pure water and sweet and wholesome provisions of good quality in accordance with the dietary scales prescribed by the Board of Trade (t). The Board of Trade may, by notice published in the London Gazette, add to these dietary scales any dietary scale which in its opinion contains in the whole the same amount of wholesome nutriment; and any dietary scale so added, inclusive of any regulations relating thereto, is to have effect so that the master of a ship may issue provisions according to either scale, whichever is mentioned in the contract ticket of the steerage passenger (a).

The master of every emigrant ship is, on request, to produce to any steerage passenger for his perusal a copy of the scale of provisions to which that person is entitled (b), and is to post up copies of the scale in at least two conspicuous places between the decks on which steerage passengers may be carried, and must keep them posted so long as any steerage passenger is entitled to remain in the ship (c).

Medical stores.

467. The owner or charterer of every emigrant ship is to provide for the use of the steerage passengers the following medical stores: namely, medicines, medical comforts, instruments, disinfectants and other things proper and necessary for diseases and accidents incidental to sea voyages, and for the medical treatment of the steerage passengers during the voyage, with written directions for the use of such medical stores. The stores must be, in the judgment of the emigration officer at the port of clearance, good in quality, and sufficient in quantity for the probable exigencies of the intended voyage, and must be properly packed and placed under the charge

(t) M. S. Acts, 1894, s. 298 (1); 1906, ss. 17, 85, Sched. II. As to the scale, see none (l), p. 338, ante. The rule as to the issue of provisions, except as to the issue of water, do not apply on a colonial voyage of less than three weeks' duration to any steerage passenger who has contracted to supply his own provisions (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 365 (3)).

(a) Ibid., s. 298 (2); M. S. Act, 1906, ss. 17, 85, Sched. II. If any of the requirements of the M. S. Act, 1894, s. 298, are not complied with in the case of an emigrant ship, the master of the ship is liable for each offence to a fine not exceeding £50 (ibid., s. 298 (3)). By ibid., s. 338, the same regulations under the same penalty are applied to ships bringing steerage passengers to the British Islands from any port outside Europe and not within the Mediterranean sea.

(b) The Board of Trade may, if it thinks fit, dispense with any specified requirements if equally effective provision is otherwise made (M. S. Act, 1906, s. 78).

(c) Ibid., s. 18 (1). The master is liable to a fine of 40*s.* for every day during default; and to the same fine if he fails to produce a copy of the scale (ibid., s. 18 (2)). The obligation of the master under ibid., s. 18, is in addition to, and not in derogation of, any obligation he may be under in pursuance of the M. S. Act, 1894, s. 361 (M. S. Act, 1906, s. 18 (4)). Any person who displaces or defaces any copy of the scale posted under ibid., s. 18, is liable to a fine of 40*s.* (ibid., s. 18 (3)). For similar requirements and penalties with reference to production and posting of the M. S. Act, 1894, Part III., on emigrant ships proceeding from the British Islands to any British possession, see ibid., s. 361. Ships carrying steerage passengers on a colonial voyage are exempt (ibid., s. 365 (1)).

An emigrant ship may not clear outwards or proceed to sea unless a medical practitioner appointed by the emigration officer at the port of clearance has inspected the medical stores and certified to the emigration officer that they are sufficient in quantity and quality, or unless the emigration officer, in case he cannot on any particular occasion obtain the attendance of a medical practitioner, gives written permission for the purpose (e).

SUB-SECT. 7.—Medical Officer and Crew.

When doctor must be carried.

468. Subject to any regulations made by Order in Council (f), a duly authorised (g) medical practitioner must be carried on board an emigrant ship where the number of steerage passengers on board exceeds 50, and also where the number of persons on board, including cabin passengers, officers and crew, exceeds 300 (h).

When the majority of the steerage passengers in any emigrant ship, or so many as 300 of them, are foreigners, any medical practitioner, whether authorised or not, may, if approved by the emigration officer, be carried therein (i).

Where a medical practitioner is carried on board an emigrant ship, he is to be rated on the ship's articles (k).

Steward and cook.

469. Every emigrant ship which carries as many as 100 steerage passengers must carry a steerage steward, who must be rated on the ship's articles, and must be a seafaring man and be approved by the emigration officer at the port of clearance. This steward is to be employed in messing and serving out provisions to the steerage passengers, and in assisting to maintain cleanliness, order and good discipline among them, and is not to assist in any way in navigating or working the ship (l). Every emigrant ship which carries as many as 100 steerage passengers must also carry one steerage cook,

(e) Ibid., s. 300 (4). On non-compliance the master is liable to a fine of £100 (ibid., s. 300 (5)).

(f) As to these, see ibid., s. 324.

(g) A medical practitioner is not to be considered to be duly authorised for the purposes of the Act unless : (a) he is authorised by law to practise as a legally qualified medical practitioner in some part of His Majesty's dominions or, in the case of a foreign ship, in the country to which that ship belongs ; and (b) his name has been notified to the emigration officer at the port of clearance and has not been objected to by him ; and (c) he is provided with proper surgical instruments to the satisfaction of that officer (ibid., s. 303 (2)).

(k) Ibid., s. 303 (4). On non-compliance, the master is liable to a fine of £100 ; and if a person proceeds, or attempts to proceed, as medical officer in any emigrant ship without being duly authorised or contrary to the requirements of ibid., s. 303, that person and anyone aiding and abetting him is liable to the like fine (ibid., s. 303 (5), (6)). The provisions as to carrying a medical practitioner do not apply on a colonial voyage whose duration is less than three weeks (ibid., s. 365 (2) (b)).

and if carrying more than 300 statute adults, two steerage cooks. They must be seafaring men, and be rated and approved as in the case of steerage stewards, and must be employed in cooking the food of the steerage passengers (m). In every such ship a convenient place for cooking must be set apart on deck, and a sufficient cooking apparatus, properly covered in and arranged, must be provided to the satisfaction of the emigration officer at the port of clearance, with a proper supply of fuel, adequate in his opinion for the intended voyage (n).

Interpreters.

470. Every foreign emigrant ship in which as many as one-half of the steerage passengers are British subjects, must, unless the master and officers, or not less than three of them, understand English and speak it intelligibly, carry, if the number of steerage passengers does not exceed 250, one person, and if it exceeds 250, two persons, who understand and speak intelligibly both English and the language spoken by the master and crew. These persons are to act as interpreters and to be employed exclusively in attendance on the steerage passengers and not in working the ship, and no such ship is to clear outwards or proceed to sea without such an interpreter on board (o).

SUB-SECT. 8.—Requirements before Sailing.

Emigrant ships.

471. An emigrant ship may not clear outwards (p) or proceed to sea until a medical practitioner appointed by the emigration officer at the port of clearance has inspected all the steerage passengers and crew about to proceed in the ship, and has certified to the satisfaction of that officer that none of the steerage passengers or crew appear to be by reason of any bodily or mental disease unfit to proceed or likely to endanger the health or safety of the other persons about to proceed in the ship (q). The inspection must take place either on board the ship or, in the discretion of the emigration officer, at such convenient place on shore before embarkation as he appoints, and the master, owner or charterer of the ship must pay to the emigration officer in respect of the inspection such fee as the Board of Trade determines (r).

(m) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 304 (2). By the M. S. Act, 1906, s. 27, in addition to the cook required by the M. S. Act, 1894, s. 304, certain ships must be provided with and carry a duly certificated cook as ship's cook; see p. 44, ante. These provisions as to stewards and cooks and cooking apparatus do not apply to a colonial voyage of less than three weeks' duration (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 365 (2) (b)). As to statute adults, see p. 331, ante.

(q) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 306 (1). If the emigration officer cannot on any particular occasion obtain the attendance of a medical practitioner, the ship may clear or proceed to sea on the emigration officer giving written permission (ibid.). As to facilities for inspection, see ibid., s. 315.

(r) Ibid., s. 306 (2). The fee must not exceed 20*s.* for every hundred persons or fraction of a hundred persons inspected (ibid.). On failure in Dealing with sick person.

472. If the emigration officer is satisfied that any person on board or about to proceed in any emigrant ship is by reason of sickness unable to proceed, or is for that or any other reason in a condition likely to endanger the health or safety of the persons on board, he must prohibit the embarkation of that person, or, if he is embarked, must require him to be relanded. And if the emigration officer is satisfied that it is necessary, for the purification of the ship or otherwise, that all or any of the persons on board should be relanded, he may require the master of the ship to reland those persons, with so much of their effects and with such members of their families as cannot in the judgment of the emigration officer be properly separated from them (s). Any person who embarks when so prohibited to embark, or fails without reasonable cause to leave the ship when so ordered to be relanded, may be summarily removed (t).

Upon such relanding, the master of the ship must pay to each steerage passenger so relanded, or if he is lodged and maintained in any hulk or establishment under the superintendence of the Board of Trade, then to the emigration officer at the port, subsistence money at the rate of 1*s.* 6*d.* per day for each statute adult, until he has been re-embarked or declines or neglects to proceed, or until his passage money, if recoverable as mentioned below, is returned to him (u).

Recovery of passage money.

473. Where a person has been relanded from an emigrant ship on account of the sickness either of himself or of any member of his family, and is not re-embarked or does not finally sail on that ship, he, or any emigration officer on his behalf, is entitled, on delivery up of his contract ticket, and notwithstanding that the ship has not sailed, to recover summarily, in the case of a steerage passenger, the whole, or in the case of a cabin passenger one-half of the moneys paid by or on account of the passenger and of the members of his family relanded, from the person to whom the same was paid, or from the owner, charterer, or master of the ship, or any of them, at the option of the person recovering the same (a).

(ii.) Master's Bond.

Master's bond.

474. Before an emigrant ship clears outwards or proceeds to sea, the master, together with the owner or charterer, or in the event of the owner or charterer being absent or being the master, one other good and sufficient person approved by the chief officer of the case of any emigrant ship to comply with the requirements of M. S. Act, 1894, s. 306, the master is liable for each offence to a fine not exceeding £100 (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 306 (3)).

(s) Ibid., s. 307 (1). If any requirement of ibid., s. 307, is not complied with in the case of an emigrant ship, the master, owner, or charterer of the ship, or any of them, is liable for each offence to a fine not exceeding £200 (ibid., s. 307 (2)).

(t) Ibid., s. 307 (3). Such person is liable to a fine not exceeding 40*s.* for each day during which he remains on board after such prohibition or requirement (ibid.).

(u) Ibid., s. 307 (4). As to statute adults, see p. 331, ante.

customs at the port of clearance, must enter into a joint and several bond, called the master's bond, in the sum of £2,000 to the Crown. The bond is to be executed in duplicate and is not liable to stamp duty. If neither the owner nor the charterer resides in the British Islands, the bond is to be for £5,000 instead of £2,000, and is to contain an additional condition for payment to the Crown as a Crown debt of all expenses incurred under the Act in rescuing, maintaining, and forwarding to their destination any steerage passengers carried in the ship who, by reason of shipwreck or any other cause, except their own neglect or default, are not conveyed by or on behalf of the owner, charterer or master to their intended destination (b).

Where an emigrant ship is bound to a British possession, the chief officer of customs at the port of clearance must certify on one part of the master's bond that it has been duly executed by the master and the other person bound, and must forward it to the governor of that possession or to such person as the governor shall appoint for that purpose (c).

Passenger lists.

475. The master of every ship carrying steerage passengers on a voyage from the British Islands to any port out of Europe, and not within the Mediterranean Sea, or on a colonial voyage (d), must before demanding a clearance for his ship (e) sign in duplicate a passengers' list; that is to say, a list correctly setting forth the name and other particulars of the ship, and of every passenger, cabin or steerage, on board of her (e). This list is to be counter-

(b) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 309. The provisions as to the master's bond do not apply to colonial voyages (ibid., s. 365 (1) (a)). For the present form of bond, see Nos. 1 and 1A of Forms prescribed by the Board of Trade, 21st May, 1908, under the M. S. Act, 1906, ss. 17, 85, Sched. II. (Stat. R. & O., 1908, pp. 616, 617). By M. S. Act, 1906, s. 20, the Board of Trade may, on the application of the owner of any emigrant ship, allow the bond to be given in the form of a continuing bond as regards that ship, and may make regulations for adapting the provisions of the M. S. Act, 1894, ss. 309, 310, to continuing bonds and prescribing conditions under which continuing bonds may be made. For these regulations and form of continuing bond, see Regulations and Forms prescribed by the Board of Trade dated the 24th October, 1909 (Stat. R. & O., 1908, p. 629).

(c) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 310 (1). Such certificate is, in any court of a British possession in which the bond is put in suit, conclusive evidence of its due execution by the master and other person bound, and there is no need to prove the handwriting of the customs officer who signed the certificate, nor that he was when he signed it chief officer of customs at the port of clearance (ibid., s. 310 (2)). Any such bond is not to be put in suit in a British possession after the expiration of three months next after the arrival of the ship in that possession, nor in the British Islands after the expiration of twelve months next after the return of the ship and of the master to the British Islands (ibid., s. 310 (3)). By M. S. Act, 1906, s. 20 (3), the provisions of the M. S. Act, 1894, s. 310 (3), are to have effect with respect to every voyage of an emigrant ship during the continuance of a continuing bond (as to which see note (b), supra), and references to the arrival and return of the ship are to be construed as references to the arrival of the ship and the return of the ship after any voyage, so far as respects matters happening during or in connexion with the voyage.

signed by the emigration officer, if there is one at the port, and then delivered by the master to the officer of customs from whom a clearance is demanded, who is to countersign and return one duplicate, called the master's list, and retain the other (f).

If at any time after the passengers' list has been so signed and delivered any additional passenger, whether cabin or steerage, is taken on board, the master must add to the master's list, and also enter on a separate list signed by him the names and other particulars of every such additional passenger. This separate list must be countersigned by the emigration officer, where there is one at the port, and must, together with the master's list to which the addition has been made, be delivered to the chief officer of customs at the port, who must thereupon countersign the master's list and return it to the master, retaining the separate list, and so on in like manner whenever any additional passenger is taken on board. If there is no officer of customs stationed at the port where an additional passenger is taken on board, these lists are to be delivered to the officer of customs at the next port having such an officer at which the vessel arrives, to be dealt with as above mentioned. When any additional passenger is taken on board, the master must, before the ship proceeds to sea, obtain a fresh certificate from the emigration officer of the port that the prescribed requirements have been complied with (g).

476. If any person is found on board an emigrant ship with intent to obtain a passage therein without the consent of the owner, charterer or master, he, as well as any person aiding and abetting him, is liable to a fine, and in default of payment to imprisonment, and may be taken without warrant before a justice of the peace, who may try the case in a summary manner (h). If any person travels or attempts to travel in any passenger steamer without first paying his fare and with intent to avoid payment thereof, he may be dealt with in a similar manner (i). Stowaways.

477. An emigrant ship may not clear outwards or proceed to sea if there is on board (1) as cargo, any article which is an explosive within the meaning of the Explosives Act, 1875 (k), or any vitriol, lucifer matches, guano or green hides, or (2) as cargo or ballast, any article or articles which by reason of their nature, quantity or mode Prohibited cargoes.

prescribed by the Board of Trade, 21st May, 1908, under M. S. Act, 1906, ss. 17, 85, Sched. II. (Stat. R. & O., 1908, p. 619).

(f) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 311 (2). If any requirement of ibid., s. 311, to be complied with by the master is not complied with in the case of any ship, or any passengers' list is wilfully false, the master for each offence is liable to a fine not exceeding £100 (ibid., s. 311 (3)).

(g) Ibid., s. 312 (1)—(4). If any requirement of ibid., s. 312, is not complied with in the case of any ship, the master is liable for each offence to a fine not exceeding £50 (ibid., s. 302 (5)).

(h) Ibid., s. 313. The fine may be £20, and imprisonment, in default, may be three months with or without hard labour (ibid.).

SECT. 2. Statutory Requirements.

of stowage are either singly or collectively in the opinion of the emigration officer (l) at the port of clearance likely to endanger the health or lives of the steerage passengers or the safety of the ship, or (3) as cargo, horses, cattle or other animals mentioned in the regulations prescribed by the Board of Trade (m), unless they are carried on the conditions stated in those regulations (n). But a Secretary of State may by order under his hand authorise the carriage as cargo in any emigrant ship, subject to any conditions and directions specified in the order, of naval and military stores for the public service (o). The order is to be addressed to and countersigned by the emigration officer, and delivered to the master of the ship to which it refers, who is to deliver it up to the chief officer of customs at the port where the stores are discharged (p). The master must comply with all the conditions and directions in the order (q).

SUB-SECT. 10.—Breach of Contract of Carriage.

Recovery of passage money.

478. Where a contract has been made by or on behalf of any steerage passenger for a passage in a ship proceeding on a voyage from the British Islands to any port out of Europe and not within the Mediterranean Sea, or proceeding on a colonial voyage (r), and such passenger is at the place of embarkation before the hour fixed in his contract, or, if no hour is so fixed, before any hour fixed for embarkation of which he has received not less than twenty-four hours' notice, and the stipulated passage money has, if required, been paid, then if such passenger from any cause whatever other than his own refusal, neglect, or default, or the prohibition of an emigration officer, or the requirement of an Order in Council, is not received on board the ship before such hour, or, having been received on board, does not either obtain a passage in the ship to the port at which he has contracted to land or, together with all the immediate members of his family who are included in the contract, obtain a passage to the same port in some other equally eligible ship to sail within ten days from the expiration of the proper day of embarkation, and is not paid subsistence money at the prescribed rate and from the prescribed time (s), such steerage passenger, or any emigration officer on his behalf, may recover summarily (t) all money paid by or on account of the

(n) M. S. Acts, 1894, s. 301 (1); 1906, ss. 17, 85, Sched. II. The penalty for any offence against the requirements of these provisions is a fine not exceeding £300 on the owner, charterer, or master, or any of them (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 301 (2)).

passenger for his passage, together with such further sum, not exceeding £10 in respect of each such steerage passenger, as to the court seems a reasonable compensation for the loss or inconvenience caused to the passenger by the loss of his passage. This money and sum may be recovered either from any person to whom or on whose account any money has been paid under the contract, or, if the contract has been made with the owner, charterer, or master of the ship, or with any person acting on behalf or by the authority of any of them, then, at the option of the passenger or emigration officer, from the owner, charterer, or master or any of them (u).

Subsistence money.

479. If any ship, whether an emigrant ship or not, does not actually put out to sea and proceed on her intended voyage before three o'clock in the afternoon of the day next after the day of embarkation appointed in the contract, the owner, charterer, or master of the ship, or his agent or any of them, must until the ship finally proceeds on her voyage pay to every steerage passenger entitled to a passage in the ship subsistence money at the rate of 1*s.* 6*d.* for each of the first ten days of detention and 3*s.* for each subsequent day for each statute adult (v). But where the steerage passengers are maintained on board as if the voyage had commenced subsistence money is not payable for the first two days after the proper day of embarkation; nor is any subsistence money payable during any part of a period of detention of the ship caused by wind or weather or any cause not attributable in the opinion of the emigration officer to the act or default of the owner, charterer, or master (w).

Unlawful landing.

480. If a steerage passenger is landed from any ship, whether an emigrant ship or not, at any other port than that at which he has contracted to land, unless with his previous consent or unless the landing is rendered necessary by perils of the sea or other unavoidable accident, the master is liable to a fine (x).

SUB-SECT. 11.—Requirements on Arrival.

End of voyage.

481. For at least forty-eight hours after his arrival at the end of his voyage every steerage passenger in an emigrant ship (y) is entitled to sleep in the ship, and to be provided for and maintained on board in the same manner as during the voyage, unless within that period the ship leaves the port in further prosecution of her voyage (a).

(u) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 328.

(v) Ibid., s. 329 (1). If the steerage passenger is lodged and maintained in any hulk or establishment superintended by the Board of Trade, the subsistence money is to be paid to the emigration officer at the port of embarkation (ibid.).

(w) Ibid., s. 329 (2).

SECT. 2. Statutory Requirements.

List of steerage passengers.

482. The master of every ship bringing steerage passengers to the British Islands from any port out of Europe and not within the Mediterranean Sea must, within twenty-four hours after arrival, deliver to the emigration officer at the port of arrival a correct list signed by the master specifying the age, name, and calling of every steerage passenger, and the port at which he embarked, and showing also any birth which has occurred amongst the steerage passengers, and the name and supposed cause of death of any steerage passenger who has died (b).

SUB-SECT. 12.—Provisions in Case of Wreck.

Maintenance of delayed or wrecked steerage passengers.

483. When an emigrant ship (1) has while in any port in the British Islands or after the commencement of the voyage been wrecked or otherwise rendered unfit to proceed on her intended voyage, and any steerage passengers have been brought back to any such port, or (2) has put into any such port in a damaged state, her master, owner, or charterer must, within forty-eight hours, give to the nearest emigration officer a written undertaking as follows:—In case (1) that such owner, master, or charterer will embark and convey the steerage passengers in some other eligible ship to sail within six weeks of the date of the undertaking to the port for which their passage has been taken; and in case (2) that the ship will be made seaworthy and fit in all respects for her intended voyage, and will within six weeks of the date of the undertaking sail again with the steerage passengers (c).

In either of these cases, the owner, charterer, or master must, until the steerage passengers proceed on their voyage, either lodge and maintain them on board in the same manner as if they were at sea, or pay to them subsistence money at the rate of 1*s.* 6*d.* a day for each statute adult (d).

Recovery of passage money.

484. If the substituted or the damaged ship, as the case may be, does not sail within the six weeks named, or the statutory requirements are not complied with, any steerage passenger, or any emigration officer on his behalf, may recover summarily all money paid by or on account of the passenger for the passage from the person to or on account of whom it was paid, or from the owner, charterer, or master of the ship at the option of the passenger or emigration officer (e).

Removal of passengers.

If the emigration officer thinks it necessary, he may direct that the steerage passengers be removed from any damaged emigrant ship at the master's expense (f).

(b) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 336 (1). The master, on non-delivery of a list or on delivering one wilfully false, is liable to a fine for each offence not exceeding £50 (ibid., s. 336 (2)).

(c) Ibid., s. 331 (1).

(d) Ibid., s. 331 (2). If the steerage passengers are lodged and maintained in any hulk or establishment under the superintendence of the Board of Trade, the subsistence money is to be paid to the emigration officer at the port (ibid.).

(e) Ibid., s. 331 (3). The statutory requirements are those of ibid., s. 331.

(f) Ibid., s. 331 (4). Any steerage passenger who thereafter refuses to leave the ship is liable for each offence to a fine not exceeding 40*s.*, or imprisonment not exceeding one month (ibid.).

Forwarding passengers.

485. If any passenger, whether cabin or steerage, is taken off any ship which is carrying any steerage passenger on a voyage from any part of His Majesty's dominions and is damaged, wrecked, sunk, or otherwise destroyed, or if any such passenger is picked up at sea from any boat, raft or otherwise, the expense incurred may be defrayed in the United Kingdom by a Secretary of State, in a British possession by the governor, or in a port elsewhere by the British consular officer (g).

If any passenger, whether cabin or steerage, from any ship which is carrying any steerage passenger on a voyage from any port in His Majesty's dominions, finds himself, without any neglect or default of his own, at any port outside the British Islands other than that for which the ship was originally bound, or at which he or anyone on his behalf has contracted that he should land, the governor of a British possession, or any person authorised by him, or the British consular officer, if the place is elsewhere, may forward the passenger to his intended destination, unless the master of the ship, within forty-eight hours of the arrival of the passenger, gives to the governor or consular officer, as the case may be, a written undertaking to forward or convey the passenger to his original destination within six weeks thereafter and carries out such undertaking (h). A passenger so forwarded is not entitled to the return of his passage money or to any compensation for loss of passage (i). All expenses thus incurred in respect of a wrecked passenger or forwarding a passenger to his destination, including the cost of maintaining the passenger until forwarded to his destination, and of all necessary bedding, provisions, and stores, are a joint and several debt to the Crown from the owner, charterer, and master of the ship on board of which the passenger had embarked (k); and in any proceeding for the recovery of that debt a certificate (l) purporting to be under the hand of a Secretary of State, governor, or consular officer, and stating the circumstances of the case and the total amount of the expenses, is admissible in evidence (m), and is sufficient evidence of the amount of the expenses and of the fact that they were duly incurred, unless the defendant specially pleads and duly proves that the certificate is false and fraudulent, or that the expenses were not duly incurred under the Act (n); but the sum so recovered is not to exceed twice the total passage money in respect of the whole number of passengers who embarked in the ship (o).

Insurance in respect of steerage passengers.

486. A policy of insurance may be effected in respect of any steerage passenger, or of any steerage passage or compensation money, and may be made to cover all liabilities to provide such passage or to pay such money, or any other similar liabilities imposed on masters, charterers, or owners (p).

SUB-SECT. 13.—Passage Brokers.

Definition.

487. Any person who sells or lets (q), or agrees to sell or let, or is in anywise concerned in the sale or letting of steerage passages in any ship proceeding from the British Islands (r) to any place outside Europe not within the Mediterranean Sea, is a passage broker (s), and the acts and defaults of any person acting under the authority or as agent of a passage broker are deemed also the acts and defaults of the passage broker (t).

Broker must be licensed.

488. No person may act, directly or indirectly, as a passage broker unless he has entered, with two good and sufficient sureties appointed by the emigration officer nearest to his place of business, into a joint and several bond (a) with the Crown in the sum of £1,000 and holds a licence for the time being in force so to act (b).

Obtaining licence.

489. To obtain a licence application must be made to the licensing authority (c) for the place where the applicant has his place of business, who, if satisfied by the applicant that he has

(q) The sale or letting must be of a passage in a named ship for a definite voyage to commence at a definite time (Morris v. Howden, [1897] 1 Q. B. 378). But a contrary view was expressed in Hart v. Hunter (1906), 5 Adam, 1.

(r) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 341 (1), which enacts that he is a passage broker for the purposes of ibid., Part III. By the M. S. Act, 1906, s. 23, the provisions as to passage brokers are applied to any person who at any place in the British Islands sells or lets, or agrees to sell or let, or is in anywise concerned in the sale or letting of, steerage passages from any place in Europe not within the Mediterranean Sea.

(s) By the M. S. Act, 1894, s. 365 (1), the provisions as to passage brokers do not apply to ships carrying steerage passengers on a colonial voyage.

(a) For form of bond and licence, see Nos. 4 and 5 of the Forms prescribed by the Board of Trade, 21st May, 1908, under the M. S. Act, 1906, s. 17 (Stat. R. & O., 1908, pp. 625, 626).

(b) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 342 (1). The officer may in lieu of two sureties accept the bond of any guarantee society approved by the Treasury (ibid., s. 342 (3)). The bond, which must be renewed on each occasion of obtaining a licence, and is not liable to stamp duty, is to be executed in duplicate, one part being deposited with the Board of Trade and the other with the emigration officer. For form of such a bond, see No. 17 of Forms prescribed by the Board of Trade under the M. S. Act, 1906, s. 17 (Stat. R. & O., 1910, p. 455); M. S. Act, 1894, s. 342 (2). Any person failing to comply with the above-mentioned requirements is liable for each offence to a penalty not exceeding £50, but the Board of Trade, and any person contracting with the Board or acting under its authority, and any passage broker's duly appointed agent, are exempt (ibid., s. 342 (4), (5)).

(c) By ibid., s. 343 (3), the "licensing authority" is, in the administrative county of London, the justices of the peace at petty sessions; elsewhere in England, the council of a county borough or county district; in Scotland, the sheriff; and in Ireland, the justices of the peace in petty sessions.

entered into the bond and deposited one part of it, and has given the Board of Trade at least fourteen clear days' notice of his intention to apply, may grant the licence, and must on so doing notify the Board of Trade forthwith (d). The licence remains in force, unless forfeited, for thirty-one days after the 31st December of the year in which it is granted (e).

Broker's agents.

490. A passage broker may not employ as an agent in his business as such any person who does not hold from him an appointment signed by him and countersigned by the emigration officer at the port nearest to his place of business, which the agent must on request produce to any emigration officer or any person treating for a steerage passage (f).

A passage broker must keep exhibited in some conspicuous place in his office or place of business a correct list in legible characters containing the names and addresses in full of every person for the time being authorised to act as agent or emigrant runner (g) for him, and must on or before the fifth day, or, if the fifth day be Sunday, the fourth day of each month, transmit a true copy of that list signed by him to the emigration officer nearest his place of business, to whom he must also report every discharge or fresh engagement of an agent or emigrant runner within twenty-four hours of its taking place (h).

SUB-SECT. 14.—Emigrant Runners.

Soliciting emigrants.

491. Any person other than a licensed passage broker or his bonâ fide salaried clerk who, in or within five miles of the outer boundaries of any port, for hire or reward, or the expectation thereof, directly or indirectly conducts, solicits, influences or recommends any intending emigrant to or on behalf of any passage broker or any owner, charterer or master of a ship, or any keeper of a lodging-house, tavern or shop, or any money-changer or other dealer or chapman for any purpose connected with the preparations or arrangements for a passage, or gives or pretends to give to any intending emigrant any information or assistance in any way relating to emigration, is an emigrant runner (i).

(d) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 343 (1), (2). For forms of notice by the applicant and the licensing authority, see Nos. 6 and 7 of Forms prescribed by the Board of Trade, 21st September, 1908, under the M. S. Act, 1906, s. 17 (Stat. R. & O., 1908, p. 627).

(e) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 344. Forfeiture may be ordered by any court on conviction of the holder of any offence under the M. S. Act, 1894, Part III., or of any breach or non-performance of its requirements, and must be at once notified by such court to the Board of Trade (ibid., s. 344). For form of notice, see Form 8 of Forms prescribed by the Board of Trade, 21st May, 1908, under the M. S. Act, 1906, s. 17 (Stat. R. & O., 1908, p. 627).

(f) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 345. Penalty for contravention of this regulation, not exceeding £50 for each offence (ibid.). For form of appointment, see Form 9 of Forms prescribed by the Board of Trade, 21st May, 1908, under the M. S. Act, 1906, s. 17 (Stat. R. & O., 1908, p. 628).

(h) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 346. Any passage broker failing to comply with these requirements is liable for each offence to a fine not exceeding £5 (ibid.).

(i) And is so regarded for the purposes of the M. S. Act, 1894, Part III.

SECT. 2. Statutory Requirements.

An intending emigrant runner must apply to the licensing authority for passage brokers (k) for the place where he wishes to act as emigrant runner and to carry on his business, who may on his application, and on the recommendation in writing of an emigration officer or the chief constable or other head officer of such place, grant him a licence and supply him with a badge (l).

An emigrant runner is not entitled to recover from a passage broker any fee, commission, or reward for any service connected with emigration, unless he is acting under the written authority of that broker; nor may he take or demand from any person about to emigrate any fee or reward for procuring his passage or in any way relating thereto (m).

SUB-SECT. 15.—Frauds in Procuring Passages.

Offences.

492. It is an offence for any person by any false representation, fraud, or false pretence to induce or attempt to induce any person to emigrate or engage a steerage passage in any ship (n), or falsely to represent himself to be, or falsely assume to act as, agent of the Board of Trade in assisting persons who desire to emigrate; or to make any false representation in an application for assistance to the Board of Trade, or to aid or abet anyone else in either of these offences (o).

(M. S. Act, 1894, s. 347). The provisions as to emigrant runners do not apply to a ship carrying steerage passengers on a colonial voyage (ibid., s. 365 (1)).

(k) See note (c), p. 350, ante.

(l) M. S. Act, 1894, s. 348. For form of licence, see No. 10 of Forms prescribed by the Board of Trade, 21st September, 1908 (Stat. R. & O., 1908, p. 628). This licence he must, within forty-eight hours after its grant, lodge with the nearest emigration officer, who is to register his name and abode, and on receipt of a fee of not more than 7*s*. supply him with a badge approved by the Board of Trade (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 348 (2)); on a renewal only the renewal and its date need be entered (ibid.). The officer must note any change of abode of the emigrant runner (ibid., s. 348 (4)). If the emigrant runner satisfies the emigration officer for the port in which he is licensed that he has lost his badge, or delivers it to the officer in a mutilated or defaced state and pays 5*s*., the officer may provide him with a new badge (ibid., s. 349). The licence remains in force until the 31st December in the year of grant unless sooner revoked by any justice for an offence against the Act or for some other misconduct of the holder, or unless forfeited (ibid., s. 348 (3)). An emigrant runner must, while acting as such, wear his badge conspicuously on his breast, must lodge his licence with the emigration officer of his port within forty-eight hours of its grant, must give notice of change of abode or the loss of his badge to that office within forty-eight hours of such change or loss, and must on demand produce his badge for inspection and allow any person to take its number. He must not mutilate or deface his badge or wear it while unlicensed, or wear any other badge than that delivered to him by the emigration officer or allow any other person to use his badge, and on non-compliance may be fined 40*s*. and his licence forfeited (ibid., s. 351). Penalty, not exceeding £5 (ibid., s. 350).

(m) Ibid., s. 352. For each offence a fine not exceeding £5 is incurred (ibid.).

(n) M. S. Act, 1906, s. 24. An offender is liable for each offence on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £50, or to imprisonment with or without hard labour for a period not exceeding three months (ibid.).

SUB-SECT. 16.—Emigration Officers.

Appointment.

493. In the British Islands the Board of Trade, and in a British possession the governor of that possession, may appoint such emigration officers and assistant emigration officers as seem necessary to act under the direction of the Board or governor as the case may be (a). All functions of an emigration officer may be performed by his assistant, and all acts to be done before an emigration officer may be done before his assistant; or at a port where there is no emigration officer or assistant, or in their absence, by or before the chief officer of customs for the time being at such port, whose duty it is in any such case to do anything which it is the duty of the emigration officer or his assistant to do (b).

SUB-SECT. 17.—Legal Proceedings.

Legal proceedings.

494. All fines and forfeitures for offences against statutory provisions relating to emigrant ships (c) are to be sued for by (1) any emigration officer; (2) any chief officer of customs; and also (3) in the British Islands, any person authorised by the Board of Trade or any officer of customs authorised by the Commissioners of Customs; and (4) in a British possession, any person authorised by its governor or any officer of customs authorised by the Government department regulating the customs in that possession (d). Any of these officers may sue for any sum of money made recoverable in respect of passage money or subsistence money before a court of summary jurisdiction on behalf of any person entitled thereto (e). In reference to such proceedings the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (f), is to apply to every place where His Majesty has jurisdiction (g). In the absence of any agreement to the contrary, the owner of a ship is ultimately responsible as between himself and any other persons made liable (h).

application, embarkation order, or other document or paper issued by the Board of Trade or by a Secretary of State for the purpose of assisting persons who desire to emigrate; or to make any false representation in any such application to the Board of Trade or a Secretary of State, or in any certificate of marriage, birth or baptism, or any other document adduced in support of any such application; or to forge or fraudulently to alter any signature or statement in any such application, certificate or statement, or to personate any person named therein (M. S. Act, 1894, s. 354, which provides for each offence a fine not exceeding £50).

(b) Ibid., s. 355 (2). A person lawfully acting as an emigration officer under the Act is in no case personally liable for the payment of any money or costs or otherwise, in respect of any contract made, or of any legal proceedings for anything done by him in his official capacity as an emigration officer and on the public service (ibid., s. 355 (3)).

Part IX.—Carriage of Mails.

SECT. 1. Application of Mail Ships Act, 1891, to certain Mail Ships.

SECT. 1.—Application of Mail Ships Act, 1891, to certain Mail Ships.

Application by Order in Council.

495. When a convention has been made with a foreign state respecting the postal service between that state and the United Kingdom (i), or respecting the privileges of mail ships—that is to say, ships engaged in any postal service of such state or of any part of His Majesty's dominions—the Mail Ships Act, 1891 (k), may by Order in Council, subject to any conditions, exceptions and qualifications contained in the Order, be made to apply during the continuance of the Order as regards such convention and foreign state, and the postal services and mail ships described in the convention (l). The Order must recite or embody the terms of the convention; it may be varied or revoked by Order in Council, but must not continue in force for any longer period than the convention (m).

SECT. 2.—Prohibition of Conveyance of Letters by Crew and Passengers.

Illegal carrying of letters.

496. Where the Mail Ships Act, 1891 (a), s. 2, applies to a convention with a foreign state, neither the master nor any other person on board a British ship to which the section applies (b) when carrying mails to or from any port of the foreign state, nor the master nor any other person on board a mail ship of the foreign state to which the provision applies when carrying mails to or from any port of the United Kingdom, may convey in the ship for delivery to another person in the foreign state or United Kingdom, as the case may be, any letters other than the letters in the mail bags (c) entrusted to the master by a postal officer (d) of the Rev., Vol. X., Post Office, p. 94); Mail Ships (France) Order in Council (South Australia and Western Australia), 5th August, 1892 (ibid., p. 104); Mail Ships (France) Order in Council (India), 16th May, 1893 (ibid., p. 106); Mail Ships (France) Order in Council (New South Wales), 16th October, 1894 (ibid., p. 108); Mail Ships (France) Order in Council (Tasmania), 2nd February, 1895 (ibid., p. 109).

(a) 54 & 55 Vict. c. 31.

(b) For the conventions and ships to which the provision applies, see the text, supra, and the Orders in Council referred to in note (m), supra.

(c) "Mail bag" means a mail of letters or a box or parcel or other envelope in which post letters within the meaning of the Acts relating to the Post Office are conveyed (Mail Ships Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 31), s. 9). For definition of post letters, see Post Office Act, 1908 (8 Edw. 7, c. 48), ss. 89, 91 (3); title POST OFFICE, Vol. XXII., p. 630.

(d) "Postal officer" means any person employed in the business of the Post Office of the United Kingdom, or a British possession or foreign state, as the case may be, whether employed by the Postmaster-General, or by the chief of the post office of the British possession, or the chief of the post

United Kingdom or of any foreign state, or than the despatches sent by the Government either of the United Kingdom or of any foreign state (e).

It is the duty of the master of the ship (f) to secure the observance of the provision by all persons on board, and to inform the proper authorities at the port at which the ship arrives of any breach thereof by any of those persons (g).

SECT. 2. Prohibition of Conveyance of Letters by Crew and Passengers.

SECT. 3.—Exemptions Enjoyed by Mail Ships.

Arrest and execution of process.

497. Where the Mail Ships Act, 1891 (h), s. 4, applies to a convention with a foreign state, and an exempted mail ship to which the provision applies (i) is in port in the United Kingdom, no person may be arrested without warrant on board that ship, and before any process, civil or criminal, authorising the arrest of any person who is on board such ship is executed, the following provisions must be observed:—

(1) Written notice of the intention to arrest a person who is or is suspected to be on board the ship, stating the hour at which, if necessary, the ship will be searched, must, if it is a ship of a foreign state, and there is at the port a consulate of that state, be left at the consulate addressed to the consular officer.

(2) The master (k) must upon demand, if the person is on board, enable the proper officer to arrest him.

(3) If the officer is unable to arrest the person without search he may, but if it is a foreign ship only after the expiration of such time after notice was left at the consulate as is specified in the convention, search the ship and arrest the person if found (l).

office of the foreign state, or by any person under him, or on behalf of any such post office (Mail Ships Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 31), s. 9).

(e) Ibid., s. 2 (1). Any person on board such ship who acts in contravention of ibid., s. 2, or refuses or fails on demand to give up to a postal officer, or, if such person is not the master, to the master, any letter so conveyed by him, is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £5 (ibid., s. 2 (2)). Any person aggrieved by such a conviction may appeal to quarter sessions (ibid., s. 7 (2)). As to ship's letters, see title POST OFFICE, Vol. XXII., p. 654.

(f) The expression "master of a ship" includes any person in charge of a ship, whether commander, mate, or any other person (Mail Ships Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 31), s. 9).

(g) Ibid., s. 2 (3); if the master wilfully fails to perform this duty he is liable to a fine not exceeding £5 (ibid.). No person is liable under ibid., s. 2, to a fine for any offence for which he has been punished by the law of the foreign state (ibid., s. 2 (4)). Ibid., s. 2, does not apply to any letters which, if sent from the United Kingdom, would be exempted from the exclusive privilege of the Postmaster-General under the Post Office Management Act, 1837 (7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 33) (repealed by the Post Office Act, 1908 (8 Edw. 7. c. 48), s. 92, Sched. II., and re-enacted thereby) (Mail Ships Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 31), s. 2 (5)).

R. & O., 1908, p. 757), and the Mail Ships (Rules) Order in Council, 1908, dated the 1st August, 1908 (ibid., p. 768).

Exemptions Enjoyed by Mail Ships.

The ship may be delayed for these purposes for the time specified in the convention and no longer (m).

If the master of a ship refuses to permit the search of his ship, any officer of customs may detain it and the master is liable to a fine of £500 (n).

Freedom of ship from arrest.

498. An exempted mail ship (o) to which the Mail Ships Act, 1891 (p), s. 5, applies is not liable to be arrested or detained by any arresting authority either for the purpose of founding jurisdiction in any court of admiralty or of enforcing the payment of any claim; but every court of the United Kingdom, by the process of which the ship could under the circumstances have been arrested or detained, has the same jurisdiction as if the ship had been so arrested or detained; and any legal proceeding in relation to any such matter may be commenced by such service in the United Kingdom as may be prescribed by rules of court (q). The High Court must on application in accordance with rules of court cause the security to be applied in discharge of any such claim (r).

Nothing, however, in the provision renders invalid the arrest or detention of a ship before the prescribed notice (s) is given to the arresting authority, but on proof that the ship is an exempted mail ship the arresting authority must release the ship (t).

(n) Ibid., s. 4 (3). By ibid., s. 4 (4), ibid., s. 4, applies to the arrest of the master in like manner as in the case of any other person. Every fine under the Act exceeding £50 may be recovered by action in the High Court in England or Ireland, or in the Court of Session in Scotland, and the court may reduce the fine. A fine under the Act not exceeding £50 may be recovered on summary conviction. Every offence for which a fine exceeding £50 may be imposed may be prosecuted summarily, but in that case the fine may not exceed £50 (ibid., s. 7 (1)). If a fine imposed on the master of a ship is not paid and cannot be recovered out of any security given under the Act, the court may, in addition to any other power for enforcing payment of the fine, direct the amount to be levied by distress or poinding of the ship, her tackle and furniture. An officer of customs in detaining a ship, or releasing a ship after detention in pursuance of the Act, must act upon such requisition or authority and under such regulations as the Commissioners of Customs may make with the consent of the Treasury (ibid., s. 7 (4)).

(q) Service of any summons or other matter in any legal proceeding under the Act is good service if made by leaving the summons for the person to be served on board the ship to which he belongs with the person being or appearing to be the master of the ship (ibid., s. 7 (3)).

(s) As to the prescribed notice, see p. 355, ante.

(t) Mail Ships Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 31), s. 5 (2). Where the Commissioners of Customs in pursuance of any Act, or as a condition of waiving any forfeiture, require a deposit to be made by any exempted mail ship to which ibid., s. 5, applies, the amount of such deposit must, on notice from the Commissioners and without further proceedings, be set apart out of the security as money belonging to the Commissioners, and be paid and applied as they direct. Any rules of court relating to such notice, payment or application must be made with the consent of the Treasury (ibid., s. 5 (2)).

Part X.—Contract of Towage.

SECT. 1. Ordinary Obligations.

SUB-SECT. 1.—Efficiency of Tug.

499. In an ordinary contract of towage the owner of the tug contracts that the tug shall be efficient for the purpose for which she is employed, and that her crew, tackle, and equipment shall be equal to the work to be accomplished, in the weather and under the circumstances reasonably to be expected (u). There is a warranty implied in such a contract that at the outset the crew, tackle, and equipment are equal to the work to be accomplished in circumstances reasonably to be expected (a), and there is an implied obligation that thereafter competent skill and best endeavours shall be used in doing the work (b). The grounding of a vessel in tow is primâ facie evidence either of the insufficient power of the tug, or of the inefficiency of her crew, tackle, or equipment (c). Contract of towage.

There is no warranty that the tug shall be able to accomplish the work in all circumstances and at all hazards, and if the contract is rendered impossible by vis major, the obligation of the tug is discharged (d). The occurrence of unforeseen difficulties does not in itself, however, discharge the tug from her contract, though it may entitle the tug to salvage remuneration instead of mere towage remuneration (d). Impossibility of performance.

Where the contract is for the service of a specified tug, there is no implied warranty that she is fit for the purpose for which she was supplied (e). Specified tug.

SUB-SECT. 2.—Mutual Obligation to Use Due Care.

500. Where a contract of towage has been made, there is an implied engagement that each vessel will perform its duty in accomplishing it, that proper skill and diligence will be used on board of each, and that neither vessel will by neglect or misconduct create unnecessary risk to the other, or increase any risk which may be incidental to the service undertaken. In case of the breach by either vessel of this duty causing damage to the other, the vessel committing the breach will be liable to the other, unless the sufferer has by misconduct or lack of skill on his own part contributed to Obligations imposed by contract.

the accident (f). This obligation continues until the work undertaken to be done is carried out to its consummation (g) or the contract is otherwise determined.

Where salvage disallowed.

Where in the course of carrying out such a contract a tug fails to fulfil its obligations, and in consequence of such failure the services become of a salvage nature, the tug is not permitted to recover as for salvage (h).

SUB-SECT. 3.—Tug under Control of Tow.

Tow controls tug.

501. In an ordinary contract of towage the tug is under the control of the tow, and must obey the directions given to her by those in charge of the tow (i). In such case the tug is not liable if by reason of such directions the tow gets into a position of danger (j), but if without good cause such directions are disobeyed by the tug and damage ensues to the tow, the tug is liable for any resulting damage and may forfeit her towage remuneration (k). A tug should not obey such directions where they are given owing to wilful misconduct or gross mismanagement of those in charge of the tow (l). Though in general the tow should give directions to the tug (m), the question as to the relation between them is one of fact (n), and the tow is not bound on all occasions to give detailed directions to the tug (o), and where no directions are given by the tow, it is the duty of the tug to direct the course (p). And it is always the duty of the tug, although she be controlled by the tow, to look out both for herself and the tow (q).

SECT. 2.—Special Conditions Relieving the Tug.

Conditions relieving tug.

502. It is competent for a tug by her contract to relieve herself from any of the ordinary obligations incident to the contract of towage (r). Where, however, there is any ambiguity in the terms of such relieving conditions they are strictly construed against the party relying upon them (s). A tug owner, where the cause of the

Though, as between the owner of the tug and the owner of the tow, the owner of the tug may by his contract be freed from liability for damage done by a vessel in tow, such a contract does not amount to an indemnity by the owner of the tow against any damages for which the tug has been held liable (v).

(b) Ibid. The Sea Regulations, 1910 (Stat. R. & O. 1910, p. 457), were made by Order in Council of the 13th October, 1910, under this authority, and have effect as if enacted in the M. S. Act, 1894. The title "Sea Regulations, 1910," though not the title given in Stat. R. & O., has judicial sanction, and throughout this part of this title the phrase "Sea Regulations" is used in place of "Collision Regulations" or similar titles.

(c) "Collision" seems here to be used in the sense of the striking together of two ships causing damage (compare The Normandy, [1904] P. 187, 198); apart from damage, the impact of one ship on another affords no cause of action (The Margaret (1881), 6 P. D. 76, 79, C. A.). Some further consideration of the term "collision" is important in this connexion. The original use, now rare or obsolete, of the word "collide" was, in a transitive sense, to dash together; it was not until about 1860—70 that "collide" was first used in this country, of ships, in the intransitive sense of coming abruptly together. So also the use of the word "collision" with regard to ships, in the sense of coming together so as to to cause damage, appears to have arisen chiefly in the latter half of the nineteenth century (compare New English Dictionary). An older word used in Admiralty Court practice and some statutes to describe the effect of one ship injuriously striking either another ship or some other object was "damage"; compare Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Turner, The "Zeta," [1893] A. C. 468, per Lord HERSCHELL, L.C., at pp. 479, 480, 483, 485. Accordingly "damage" and "action of damage" were the terms in ordinary use to describe the fact and the legal remedy for it in the books and thereby regulate the lights to be carried and exhibited, the fog signals (e) to be carried and used, and the steering and sailing rules to be observed, by ships (f).

SUB-SECT. 2.—Principles of Construction.

Simple and seamanlike construction.

504. The first principles of construction laid down by the courts with regard to the Sea Regulations are to the effect that records relating to the Admiralty Court for a considerable time before the nineteenth century, and even during the first half of that century, and they are still sometimes used now ("causes of damage" is still the general expression in the Admiralty Court for damage cases; see The Normandy, [1904] P. 187, 199; compare also "Damage" in Williams and Bruce's Admiralty Practice, 3rd ed., 1902, and in Pritchard's Admiralty Digest, 1st ed., 1847). Actions of damage between two ships were not very common before the nineteenth century, and during the first twenty years of that century there were only 112 such actions in the Admiralty Court (Abbott on Shipping, 14th ed., p. 908; compare The Clarence (1853), 1 Ecc. & Ad. 206, 208 ("cases of damage, now augmenting to twenty, where there was only one thirty or forty years ago")). Such actions have grown in number and importance with the increase in the number and tonnage of ships, and especially with the introduction of steamships, able to proceed in any direction and at great speed. Hence the frequency and importance of the damage itself, of the regulations to prevent it, and of the legal remedy against the wrong-doer, have all grown largely during the last hundred years, and during the same period have arisen the expressions "action of damage by collision," and now often simply "collision action." But cases of ships striking something which is not engaged in navigation are still very rare (The Normandy, [1904] P. 187, 201). Arising out of these facts, one result of considerable practical importance is that "collision," having more recently displaced the old term "damage," is still to some extent a word of ambiguous meaning. In matters of Admiralty practice and some other cases it appears to be confined to the striking together of two ships. For this narrower meaning, compare The Normandy, supra (the jurisdiction over "damage by collision" given by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3, does not extend to damage done by a vessel by striking against another object which is not a vessel), followed in The Upcerne, [1912] P. 160; Reischer v. Borwick, [1894] 2 Q. B. 548, 552, C. A. ("the risk of collision, by which I understand collision with other ships"); Chandler v. Blogg, [1898] 1 Q. B. 32 ("collision" when used alone, without other words, means two navigable things coming into contact); Bennett S.S. Co. v. Hull Mutual Protection Society, Ltd. (1913), 82 L. J. (K. B.) 1003 (nets extending a mile from ship not part of ship). But sometimes in marine insurance and in other cases "collision" is used in the sense of a ship striking an object which is not a ship; compare Re Margetts and Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation, [1901] 2 K. B. 792 (striking an anchor held to be collision); M'Cowan v. Baine, The "Niobe," [1891] A. C. 401 (striking the tug is collision with the tow); Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Turner, The "Zeta," [1893] A. C. 468; title INSURANCE, Vol. XVII., p. 442.

(d) The collision regulations made under this authority in fact extend to inland waters, but are not in this respect ultra vires (The Anselm, [1907] P. 151, C. A.). Such regulations are by the M. S. Act, 1894, s. 418 (1), to have effect as if they were part of the Act, which seems important in this connexion. See, further, under the preliminary article of the Sea Regulations, 1910, "and in all waters connected therewith," pp. 376, 377, post.

(e) Though no power is given under this provision to make regulations for helm signals, such signals as imposed by the Sea Regulations, 1897, art. 28 (Stat. R. & O. Rev., Vol. VIII., Merchant Shipping, p. 275), were held to have full statutory effect (The Aristocrat, [1908] P. 9, 20, C. A.).

(f) The word used in the Sea Regulations, 1910, is not "ships," but "vessels." As to this, see the preliminary article "by all vessels,' pp. 374, 375, post, and p. 14, ante.

they are to be interpreted in a simple way and with seamanlike knowledge. They are to be read in a literal or simple manner, and not according to the strictest and nicest interpretation of language, because they are issued for the guidance of seafaring men, sometimes men on vessels of small size and value, who will be inclined to read them literally (g). They should be read with seamanlike knowledge, because statutory provisions which are made applicable to a large trade or business should be construed according to their reasonable and business interpretation with regard to such trade or business (h), and this principle appears to have peculiar force when the courts are dealing with business on the seas.
